Abstract

At the beginning of the 1990's, after a period of momentary confusion, when Czech literature seems to have temporarily lost its way in the newly establishing democratic society which emerged after the fall of communism a number of rather interesting and important writers appeared. Holding the memories of recent communist past and experiencing the historical turning point when Czech society rejoined the capitalist West, they produced an image of cultural and political initiation. They bore witness to the arrival of chaos, associated with regime change, to a crisis of personal values and a search for new ways of existence. This thesis analyzes the literary work of two contemporary Czech writers, Emil Hakl and Jan Balabán. It explores the way the reality of their narratives is shaped. It investigates the reality these narratives reflect, the reality these narratives create and the reality that the reader of these narratives re-creates on the basis of his/her knowledge of the world. The thesis considers the value judgments which are being made by Czech society through its contemporary literature about its post-communist present. The thesis also examines the question to what extent these narratives construct an image of contemporary Czech society. The thesis deals with the complete fiction written by Emil Hakl (b. 1958) and Jan Balabán (1961-2010), two popular and critically acclaimed Czech writers. The first part of the thesis analyzes Hakl's fiction, in particular his debut Konec světa (The End of the World), a work which opens the world of Jan Beneš (Hakl's real name), the narrating character of this text and also the narrating character of almost all the other texts written by Emil Hakl. The second part of the thesis focuses on the constructed and deconstructed world of Jan Balabán's fiction. It deals with themes and motifs that appear and re-appear in the lives of Balabán's male and female characters and explores individual characters whose lives have been shaped by their own personal breakdowns as well as by changes in the social and political conditions of the external world. The thesis analyzes Hakl's and Balabán's narratives from a narratological point of view. The thesis uses the semiotic and narratological approach (H. Porter Abbott, Mieke Bal, Seymour Chatman, Tomáš Kubíček and Gerald Prince), the post-structuralist approach (Roland Barthes, Jacques Derrida, Julia Kristeva), the psychoanalytical approach (Jacques Lacan, Slavoj Žižek), the postmodern (Steven Connor), the theories dealing with the typology and the mythology of the novel and the city (Daniela Hodrová), the cultural approach (John Storey) and the approach of New Historicism (Louis A. Montrose, Hayden White).

Introduction

Telling a story is as old as the history of humankind; it enables people to recognize the world they live in, places they act in and the spheres they think in. All humans have their own narratives which they enjoy and share with others; from childhood, they carry a compulsion to communicate their ideas and images with which they have been surrounded every day since they began to put words together and create simple sentences. Through a narrative, humans search for their understanding of the 'real' world and for the recognition of their life in time and space.

Narrative arises from the tension and the relation between the outer time which is marked off by the permanent motion of the hands of the clocks, by the astronomical cycle of the universe, by the inner time shaped by people's mind and by their apprehension of incidents and events that accompany their lives during the whole period of their existence. Both the human being (the story of one's life) and his/her way of living his/her life (the narration) within the constraints of his/her internal and external experience (the discourse) of his/her life construct the narrative of an individual's world and, in union with others, the narrative of the whole human world.

The story of people born in Czechoslovakia in the second half of the twentieth century has been shaped by the collective experience of communist times and by the political pro-democratic and pro-capitalist regime change that affected the country after 1989. The people living in Czechoslovakia/the Czech Republic have reflected in their life stories upon an individual's perception of these events and borne witness to the individual's journeys through the new developments. A new, different narrative has been created in all spheres of life.

It is no surprise that literary works written in this era have played an essential and a creative part in the story that Czech society has produced over the years of its existence. Their narratives have attempted to capture what has been happening to individuals' lives in the world of today and their interpretations have been journeys taken to find out what has been happening to the readers living in the world of today. In general terms, their narratives have been constructs of people's minds created in the moment of their recording and re-created every time a reading individual approached them. They have been narratives of individual's life when this individual decided to acknowledge them, voice them and interpret – within the time and the space of their own being.

There are various ways we can approach narratives of literary works. One approach leads from the writer's experience of the 'real' world to his/her reflection of this experience in the text. The other approach goes in the reverse direction: from a text and the 'fictive' reality the text constructs to the reader's subjective perception of this text and the reality he/she considers the text constructs. My thesis analyzes the work of two contemporary Czech writers, Emil Hakl (b. 1958) and Jan Balabán (1961-2010) and it uses both ways to approach them. It examines the relation between Hakl's and Balabán's texts, the 'reality' these texts reflect, the 'reality' these texts create and the 'reality' that the reader re-creates on the basis of his/her own knowledge of the world. The thesis touches on these two writers' actual individual and social experiences as one of their sources of inspiration and it investigates the structure of their narratives – as a unique product of creation. It constructs the model of the world these narratives create and it looks for the possible meanings of these texts, based on the reader's subjective experience of literary and social discourses that participated in the process of the text creation (or not). Somewhere in between, the thesis searches for the understanding of the text and the reality it contemplates. It looks at Hakl's and Balabán's literary work as an image, as it is 'a representation of the world and the representation of reality despite the fact that it is also an individual unit and that it creates a fictive world which is real only in varying degrees.' ['(Literární dílo zobrazuje) a značí svět a realitu navzdory tomu, že je svébytným celkem a že buduje svět fiktivní, v různém stupni reálný.'] (Hodrová 2001: 112) My thesis will relate to both the unique product of human creation and the image Hakl's and Balabán's works depict and re-create.

1. Czech literature after the 1989

1.1 The new roles of Czech literature

Over the past years, literary history has been trying to map the way Czech literature has been leading since the arrival of the new political regime in 1989. This has not been a simple task. The new political regime brought many changes to the way Czech people lived, how they thought and, in consequence, also to how and what they created. The re-introduction of democracy and the capitalist way of thinking opened the door to a different perception of freedom. Free trade-market economy replaced the old system of centralized and state controlled economy and, instead of various limitations, offered a variety of free choices. People could suddenly buy and sell almost any product, any service or information without restraint. In addition, it was possible to publish almost anything, regardless of its quality and its potential impact. The influx of information has been immense.

The reaction of Czech literature to all the changes was enormous. Authors who were not allowed to publish officially during the communist regime could suddenly bring their works to public. At the same time, a number of new writers appeared on the Czech literary scene. Books which, during the communist regime, were almost sacred objects and were frequently hard to get, suddenly became common and easily obtainable goods. In a few years, many of them ended up in remainder shops being sold at large discounts. A vast overproduction of books, an increased publishing activity and the influx of international literature of mostly Western production brought joy to the reading public but also an unexpected chaos. Nowadays, people can read almost anything they wish. However, the search for quality and complexity of narratives becomes more complicated.

Furthermore, the position of Czech writers changed after 1989. Since the fall of communism, Czech writers have not had to struggle with any political and cultural restrictions in order to publish their work in recognised publishing houses any more. However, at the same time, the position and the reception of literature, as well as the perceived societal and political role of the writers, changed radically, and in many ways literature was pushed to the cultural margins of society. As Petr Bílek argues, 'literature lost its role which it had played in the past, specifically from the period of the National

Revival¹ onwards when it stood in not only for all the other fields of culture, but also for political studies, sociology, philosophy and journalism. The concept of the writer as the “nation’s conscience” disintegrated after the “Velvet Revolution”² [‘literatura zcela zjevně ztratila roli, kterou hrála v minulosti, od doby národního obrození, kdy literatura suplovala nejen veškerou ostatní kulturu, ale také politologii, sociologii, filozofii a novinářství. Pojem spisovatele jako “svědomí národa” se po “sametové revoluci” rozložil.’]³

Nowadays, Czech literature does not play the role of the mouthpiece of the nation, for nowadays there is no totalitarianism in the Czech Republic, no oppressive regime which would suppress an individual’s freedom in the name of ideology. There is no need to use literature as a weapon against an ideology of the state anymore as the external conditions which required literature to be the “nation’s conscience” have disappeared. Nowadays, Czech literature concentrates on entertaining readers by dealing with various subject matters, including those which were taboo in the past. Contemporary Czech literature is now a dynamic part of contemporary Czech culture and is, at the same time, an important vehicle which contributes substantially to our understanding of contemporary Czech society and the world it creates.

1.2 Aleš Haman - two lines of contemporary Czech prose

The year 1989 has not only changed the position of Czech literature and its perception by the public. It has also influenced the narratives of individual works. According to Czech literary scholar Aleš Haman (Haman 2001), Czech fiction has been developing along two main lines since the 1990s. In his view, the first line of contemporary Czech prose has been using authenticity and awareness. This work of fiction highlights people’s existence which is limited by the passage of time, the demystification of all the illusions and the gradual destruction of all the idols which could have served as anchor points on the scale of passing time. The authors of authentic literature show how the ‘I’ perceives the world and how this ‘I’ lives within it. Often these writers try to recall various impressions, feelings and moments connected with their pasts as they search for family roots and traditions or their own personal history. Their testimony can sometimes resemble diaries or memoirs⁴ but it also uses a more subjective perspective.⁵ Often, especially in the texts of younger authors, this type of writing is distinctively lyrical.⁶ Such literature occurs between autobiography, personal memories and reflections of contemporary life. It is often characterized by variation and by the blending of different time planes, as the 'I' travels through its own past and recalls the moments that play more or less important roles in its later adulthood. The authors are often looking for a new conception of 'authentic' literature. That is why, apart from writing memoirs and diaries, they approach various literary styles and genres (the epistolary form, gospel writing, parody and fiction) and use their techniques to create a new and a different type of prose, its main intention being based on authenticity⁷ or, even better, on quasi authenticity.⁸

² The ‘Velvet Revolution’ is a term which denotes the non-violent regime change which took place in Czechoslovakia from 17th to 29th November 1989. It resulted in the collapse of the communist regime and in the introduction of democracy to Czechoslovakia.

³ In <http://www.blisty.cz/art/12456.html>

The second line, as Haman argues, has tended towards the deconstruction of the narrative using a sophisticated but tricky game of various associations. This type of literature mixes fantastic visions with real images. This is the line of fantastic, imaginative and metaphysical literature. Its representatives are usually regarded as literary postmodernists, even though not all of them accept such a label.⁹ The prose of these authors is based on their creative personalities and on their lust for freedom. Their stories are mostly set in a city (often Prague), which is full of bizarre spaces, secret corners, cellars and labyrinths which at the same time, reflect the mythology of the current era with all its icons – advertising, computer games, mass media. Behind the secret though real places, new spaces inhabited by mysterious creatures are discovered. Fantastic plants and animals complete the picture of a 'chaotic' world. Such narratives are inspired by a desire to explore the depths of the collective consciousness. They use the principles of folk tales, particularly the never ending fight between good and evil; they re-use old allegories and fables and shock their readers by re-interpretations of traditional tales and legends. This

⁷ Haman mentions for example works of Ludvík Vaculík (b. 1926), Lenka Procházková (b. 1951), Martin C. Putna (b. 1968), Patrik Ouředník (b. 1957) and Michal Viewegh (b. 1962).

type of literature is characterized by intentional work with a number of existing texts and their combinations. Thus a complicated structure of meaning is created within every new narrative.

According to Haman, both the literature looking towards the authenticity of the human experience and the imaginative prose have one thing in common. Both are leading away from the literature based on the complexity and fluidity of storytelling. But whilst the first line tends to use a biographical, almost documentary style of writing as a means of expressing their desire for personal authenticity and freedom, the second line results in the destruction of narrative as a means of expressing the postmodern scepticism towards the historical and narrative continuity (Ibid: 14).

From Haman's notes, it follows that authors of both authentic and imaginative lines of Czech literature use their perception of the real world as an inspiration for the construction of the world which is fictive. The authentic line of literature is based on the discovery and re-discovery of the past and on the perception of this past within the reality of the present world. It is also based on the present world and on the individual's perception of his/her present existence within it. The imaginative line of literature is often using the reality of the real world as a ground from which various other individual worlds arise and exist parallel to it.

From all the above notes that Haman makes on the address of contemporary Czech literature, it follows that it is the contemporary reality that is especially questioned in works of contemporary Czech writers and this is happening regardless of the writer's approach and his/her writing style. But what reality is it – contemporary Czech or contemporary human? Is it the reality of the end of the communist regime, of the arrival of democracy and a capitalist way of thinking? Is it the reality of lost values and newly established principles and structures? Is it the reality of the so called post-modern world which thrives on consumerism, fast development of information technologies and fast transfer of information, knowledge and products? Is it the reality of individuals and subjective truths? Is it the reality of constantly questioned and constantly interpreted truths? Is it the reality of a mass-media world? Is it the reality of people living at the end of millennia? Is it the reality of chaos?

If we decide to follow Haman's theory on contemporary Czech literature and apply it on the subject of our thesis, we then have to ask what position does the prosaic work of two contemporary Czech writers, Emil Hakl and Jan Balabán, hold within this scheme, if any; what reality they deal with; what approach to the reality they apply – authentic, imaginative, both together or another one, and how they work with it. To answer all these questions, we will be searching for the originality of Hakl's and Balabán's work as well as for anything that may signify their possible connection with the works of other contemporary Czech writers. We will be searching for the image of the contemporary Czech world as it is being constructed in the works of contemporary Czech writers.

Before we start exploring the work of the two authors mentioned above, it is important to explain what has influenced my decision to select the texts written by Emil Hakl and Jan Balabán as two subject matters of my work about contemporary Czech fiction. For this reason, the thesis will begin with an introduction of both writers: it will outline their personal background; it will touch upon some aspects of their political, social and cultural experience and upon their own revelations about their writing career. In other words, it will recall the time and the place in which both writers created their work and consider whether there is anything that connects them. Subsequently, it will turn its attention to the public recognition of Hakl's and Balabán's work. This will be done with the intention of putting the literary work of both writers into the context of contemporary Czech society and with an intention to connect their testimonies with the social impact of their works. It follows from the information about the reception of the works of these two authors that the themes with which the authors deal – and which are the subject of this thesis – receive serious consideration in the ongoing public debate in the Czech Republic. This is why it is important to analyze their testimonies about contemporary life in the Czech Republic. It is also why it is important to analyze any literary testimony about contemporary life in the Czech Republic. It is a message which people give to themselves about themselves and about the reality they are living. Each literary testimony contains this message. We, in our perception of these works, relate this message to our own experience of the world.

2. Facts about Hakl's and Balabán's personal lives and experiences

2.1 Biographies outlined

Both writers, Emil Hakl (b. 1958) and Jan Balabán (1961-2010), came from the same generation which grew up during the communist 1960s, experienced the “normalized”¹⁰ 1970s and 1980s and were affected by the post-communist era after the 1989 regime change. Emil Hakl (his real name is Jan Beneš) spent this time in the capital, Prague, and its regional surroundings. Jan Balabán lived mainly in Ostrava, in an industrial city in the north-east of Moravia, near the borders between Moravia, Silesia, Slovakia and Poland.

The central Bohemian region, and especially Prague, Prague boroughs, Prague streets, buildings and parks, local figures, local clubs and pubs, local concerts and literary happenings became characteristic features of Hakl's literary world. The author's professional career in various jobs and his participation in numerous cultural activities have also served as inspiration for his work, as we will explore later. In the first half of the 1980s, Hakl took part in several amateur theatre performances with a group of his friends; these included adaptations of such authors as Vladimir Khlebnikov¹¹ and Boris Vian¹². At this time, Emil Hakl graduated from the Jaroslav Ježek Conservatoire (as the institution is called today), specializing in creative writing; later, he also completed two years of dramatic studies at the same school. In 1988, Hakl participated in the establishment of the literary group, Moderní analfabet (The Modern Illiterates)¹³, whose activity consisted of

regular authors' reading performances in various Prague and regional clubs. Their tradition was later taken over by Literární klub 8 (Literary Club 8). Hakl also cooperated with the literary Pant klub.

Under the communist regime, Hakl worked in various manual labour jobs. After being a decorator, librarian, warehouseman, petrol station attendant and sound engineer, in 1996-2000 he found himself employed as a copywriter for an advertising company and, in 2001, he held the position of editor for the fortnightly literary journal Tvar. Nowadays, he works as a journalist for the popular weekly glossy, Instinkt. His articles and excerpts from his literary work have also been published in Iniciály, Literární noviny, Aluze, Salon, the cultural supplement to the daily Právo, the weekly magazine, Týden, and in the internet magazine, Dobrá adresa.

Jan Balabán, on the other hand, chose Ostrava, the place where he grew up and raised his family, the place with a long history of steel-making, a city which is dominated by coal mines, steel furnaces and its surroundings, including the Beskydy Mountains, as the main locations for his prose. His work emphasizes the unique industrial architecture of the city of Ostrava and the post communist remnants of the culture represented by working class housing estates, factories, local residential schemes and people living in them.

Balabán was brought up in a family with a Protestant intellectual tradition. His grandfather was a Protestant minister. His uncle, Milan Balabán (b. 1929), is a well-known minister, theologian and professor at the Protestant Theological Faculty at Charles University in Prague. Balabán's bond to his family tradition and to his religious faith is reflected in all of his fiction.

Like Emil Hakl, Jan Balabán maintained contact with the alternative cultural scene from the 1980s onwards. With his brother Daniel, an artist, and other people with similar political, artistic and cultural view points (e. g. Jiří Surůvka, Jaroslav Žila, Petr Hruška and Ivan Motýl¹⁴), he held various meetings and unofficial exhibitions in the lofts or stairwells, sometimes also producing anthologies typed on typewriters. In one of the interviews, when discussing the beginnings of his literary career, Balabán said:

same title. The review brought out mainly the work of those writers who did not publish their work in official publishing houses during the previous regime; some of them because they were not allowed to, others because they did not want to cooperate with the communist establishment. These authors were not connected by any literary program. In <http://slovníkeskeliteratury.cz>.

‘We were not really terribly typical members of the underground anti-establishment; after all, we did manage to finish our university studies; we did not say to each other, “Let’s ignore the official structures and create our own, alternative ones”, but we found out that we could not find satisfaction in those official structures. So we did it all [the unofficial activities] mainly for our own pleasure. But it was, as I said before, also accompanied by our lack of critical judgement and by pseudo-heroism.’

[‘My jsme taky nebyli žádní undergroundáci, my jsme nakonec ty vysoké školy vystudovali. Neřekli jsme si, tak na všechno kašlem a budeme se realizovat v jiných strukturách, my jsme akorát zjistili, že v těch oficiálních strukturách se realizovat nelze. Takže jsme to dělali hlavně samozřejmě pro své potěšení, ale bylo to, jak už jsem říkal, provázeno také nekritičností a pseudohrdinstvím.’]

(Balabán; Horák 2002: Tvar, vol. 18: 1, 14-15)

This attitude will turn out to have been significant for Balabán’s whole writing career.

After graduating from Palacký University in Olomouc where he studied Czech and English, Balabán got a job as a technical translator for the Vítkovice Ironworks; later he also worked as a free-lance translator from English (he translated H. P. Lovecraft, Terry Eagleton and other authors) and regularly as a journalist. His articles were published in literary magazines Host, Revolver Revue, Literární noviny, Tvar, Script, Respekt and art-magazine Ateliér. Jan Balabán was also a co-founder of an art-literary group called Přirození and a co-editor of magazines Landek (1995-1998) and Obrácená strana měsíce (2003-2006). He also presented various art exhibitions in Ostravian club Černý pavouk and in other galleries based in Ostrava and its surroundings. Jan Balabán died from heart failure in 2010.

From the above notes on the writers’ lives, it follows that what connected Emil Hakl and Jan Balabán in their lives was their age, their general political and social experiences, a similar critical attitude towards official communist culture (they participated in the creation of the underground and alternative literary structures), their involvement in various cultural activities and in journalism and their urban existence. What made them different were the places where they live[d], their family backgrounds, their religious traditions and their individual personalities.

2.2 The beginnings

Both Hakl and Balabán started publishing in the 1990s. Emil Hakl brought out his first work, a book of poetry, Rozpojená slova (Disconnected Words), in 1991; the second volume, Zkušební trylky z Marsu (Experimental trills from Mars) came out much later, in 2000. Since then, he has been publishing short stories and novels.

Jan Balabán published his first work, Středověk (The Middle Ages), a collection of short stories, in 1995. But, like Hakl, he also wrote poetry first, although none of his poems has appeared in a single published anthology. A little fragment of his poetic attempts can still be found in Balabán's prose debut mentioned above. However, the influence of poetry and a drive to write stories are evident in all of his fiction.

Emil Hakl and Jan Balabán have consciously decided to write fiction and both have chosen the form of short stories as well as the form of novels, although Jan Balabán also wrote a drama (Posedlí - Crazies, 2006 and Bezruč?!, 2009) and a graphic novel (Srdce draka – The Heart of A Dragon, 2001) and Hakl co-wrote a film script of his novel (O rodičích a dětech – Of Kids and Parents, 2008). How the literary work by Emil Hakl differs from the work by Jan Balabán and whether there is something that connects them on the semantic level and on the level of its form is one of the main themes of this thesis. The reality which these works depicts is another one.

3. Public acknowledgement. Critical recognition.

3.1 Critical overview

The literary work of both Emil Hakl and Jan Balabán is an integral and a highly regarded part of contemporary Czech culture. It has received accolades from the Czech reading public as well as from Czech literary critics, as we can see from the following list of various awards and from the large number of articles and reviews published about the work of these two writers in the Czech Republic as well as abroad.

Until now, Emil Hakl has published two collections of poems and eight works of fiction. Together with Petr Šabach and Martin Šmaus, two contemporary Czech writers, he also published a collection of short stories, Někdy jindy, někde jinde (In Another Time, in Another Place, 2009). His own collection of short stories, Konec světa (The End of the World), was released in three successive editions (2001, 2002 and 2003). His novel, Intimní schránka Sabriny Black (Sabrina Black's Intimate Mailbox, 2002), was re-edited by the author and published in a new 'final cut' version in 2010. His novella, O rodičích a dětech (Of Kids and Parents), was published in three successive editions (2002, 2003 and 2008). In 2003, this novella received the Magnesia Litera Prize¹⁵ for the best contemporary Czech work of fiction. The novella was translated into English (Marek Tomin, 2007), into German, Austrian German, Polish, Slovene language and French. This novella was also made into a film directed by Vladimír Michálek (in 2008). In 2011, Hakl's collection of short stories, O létajících objektech (On Flying Objects, 2004), was also translated into English, this time by Petr Kopet and Karen Reppin. Hakl's Pravidla směšného chování (The Rules of Laughable Behaviour) received a nomination for Magnesia Litera Prize (2011), the Josef Škvorecký Prize for the best work of fiction in 2010 and the second place in the Lidové noviny Award for the best literary work of the year 2010. In 2013, Emil Hakl published his novel, Skutečná událost (The Real Thing), for which he was also awarded his second Magnesia Litera Prize, and in 2014 another collection of short stories, Hovězí kostky (Beef Cubes). The last two works are not the subject of my thesis as my thesis is limited by the year 2012.

During his professional career, Jan Balabán published seven works of fiction, one graphic novel and two theatre plays. He also contributed his texts to collections of stories written by a selected number of contemporary Czech writers: 7edm (Seven, 2005), Nech mě žít (Let me Live, 2006), Šťastné a veselé I, II (Happy and Merry Christmas, 2006, 2008) and Evropa – fascinující příběhy (Europe – Fascinating Stories, 2010). His collection of short stories, Prázdniny (Holidays), was published twice (1998 and 2007). The second edition, dated 2007, included an audio CD with the author's own recording of four stories from the collection. His novel, Kudy šel anděl (Where the Angel Walked), was published twice (2003 and 2005) and the collection of short stories, Možná že odcházíme (Maybe We Are Leaving), in three editions (2004, 2007 and 2011). In 2004, Možná že odcházíme (Maybe We Are Leaving) received the Lidové noviny Award for the best literary work and a nomination for the State Prize for Literature. In 2005, the collection was awarded the Magnesia Litera Award for the best work of fiction and later also it received the award Magnesia Litera – Book of the Decade, 2000-2010. Balabán's last novel, Zeptej se táty (Ask Your Dad), which was published after his death, received the Lidové noviny Award – the Book of the Year for 2010, the weekly magazine Respekt Book of the Year Award for 2010 and the Magnesia Litera Book of the Year Prize for 2010. In 2012, the same novel was recorded and released on audio CD.

In 2010, the publishing house, Host, brought out the first volume of Balabán's collected work, Povídky (A Collection of Short Stories); the second volume, Romány a novely (Novels and Novellas), was published in 2011 and the third volume, Publicistika a hry (Magazine articles and plays), in 2013. In 2011, Balabán's family, friends and colleagues have presented their memories and views of the author in their collective work entitled Honzo, ahoj! Setkání s Janem Balabánem (Honza, good bye! An Encounter with Jan Balabán). On 29th December 2011, Czech Television 2 broadcasted the documentary: Jan Balabán svými vlastními slovy. Záznamy z let 1998 až 2010. Dokumentární film o Janu Balabánovi, českém spisovateli, překladateli a publicistovi (Jan Balabán, in his own words. Recordings from 1998–2010. A Documentary about Jan Balabán, Czech writer, translator and journalist.) In 2013, Blanka Kostřicová published her work on Jan Balabán's fiction with the title Sestupy a naděje Jana Balabána (Falls and Expectations of Jan Balabán).

Emil Hakl and Jan Balabán have presented their work of fiction at various literary events and reading sessions in the Czech Republic as well as abroad. Their names are mentioned in several anthologies, textbooks and critical works such as Serafin, S. and Mihailovich, V.

D.: Twenty-first-century Central and Eastern European Writers. Series: Dictionary of Literary Biography (2010), Janoušek, P. (Ústav pro českou literaturu AV ČR): Slovník české literatury po roce 1945 (The Dictionary of Czech Post-1945 Literature, online dictionary), Hruška, P. – Machala, L. – Vodička, L. – Zizler, J.: V souřadnicích volnosti: česká literatura devadesátých let dvacátého století v interpretacích (In Coordinates of Freedom: Czech Literature of the 1990s in Interpretations, 2008). Their fiction can be found in almost every Czech library and bookshop.

Hakl's and Balabán's literary works have also been frequently discussed in many literary and non-literary magazines and papers. Looking only in the electronic catalogue of Czech printed periodicals (ANL), we find more than one hundred articles, interviews and critical reviews about Hakl's work of fiction and even more than one hundred and fifty of them about Balabán's literary testimony. Critical reviews vary from personal admiration to reviewer's disappointment, depending on a single title. Nonetheless, a large number of articles present Emil Hakl and Jan Balabán as exceptional writers with a specific style of writing and with an ability to write stories which, according to some critics, attract the reading public by their significant atmosphere and their distinctive expression of everyday reality. For instance, Petr Pýcha considers Emil Hakl a writer who, within only three years between publishing the collection Konec světa and O rodičích a dětech (for which he was awarded Magnesia Litera Award in 2003), became 'one of the most important figures of contemporary Czech literature' ['patří k nejvýraznějším osobám současné české literatury'].¹⁶ Ondřej Cakl contemplates on Hakl's short stories included in Konec světa and declares that they are 'smart, intriguing and brisk (...) and presented with an interesting style of writing' ['velmi chytře napsané, poutavé a svěží... podávány zajímavou technikou'].¹⁷ Bára Gregorová praises Hakl's work for its readability¹⁸, and Jan Čulík does it for its authenticity and its attempt to capture the reality of everyday life 'in this time, when a majority of Prague intellectuals does everything possible to ignore the contemporary reality and its problems...' ['v době, kdy se většina pražských intelektuálů téměř programově vyhýbá skutečnosti a problémům dneška...'].¹⁹ Finally, Vladimír Karfík finds Hakl's collection of short stories, Pravidla směšného chování, 'a testimony of one generation', significant for the writer's 'ability to transform the language of contemporary reality into the language of literature, and even more, into the language of poetry'

[‘[Haklova kniha] je generační výpověď, která je výjimečná především velmi osobitým jazykem. Autor dokázal jazyk dneška přetavit v jazyk literární až básnický’].²⁰

Critical reviews of Balabán’s work are carried out in a similar way. Karel Franczyk sees Jan Balabán as an ‘accomplished writer who presents his own style of writing, distinct expression and a specific atmosphere in the works he creates’ [‘[Jan Balabán je] hotovým zralým spisovatelem s vlastním stylem, výraznou poetikou a charakteristickou atmosférou, kterou ve svých knihách vytváří’].²¹ According to Radim Kopáč, Balabán’s literary work, especially his collection of short stories, Možná že odcházíme, leaves ‘deep and ineffaceable imprints in the Czech literature of 1990’s and in the Czech literature of contemporary times’ [‘[zanechává] v české literatuře devadesátých let minulého století a v přítomnosti hluboké a nesmazatelné stopy’].²² Jiří Peňás talks about the impact of Balabán’s stories on the reading public, comparing them to those of Tchechov and Carver, especially emphasising their multi-layered meaning hidden below their sentences.²³ Josef Chuchma considers Balabán’s short stories, Možná že odcházíme, one of the finest in contemporary Czech literature and a challenge to a strict division between “entertaining” and “great art.”²⁴ Finally, Pavel Mandys finds Balabán exceptional because he believes that Balabán has brought into the poetics of the Czech short story (represented by a continuation of the inherited 20th century story-telling tradition, such as Čapek, Hrabal or Ota Pavel) ‘a fleeting moment of human enlightenment in the middle of everyday, often heavier and deeper banality of life captured in minimalistic style’ [‘prchavý záblesk životního poznání uprostřed všednodenní, často stále tíživější banality zachycený maximálně úsporným stylem’]²⁵ and therefore something that was in the world of literature introduced by internationally renowned writers, such as Raymond Carver in the 1970s.

A closer look at the list of Hakl’s and Balabán’s awards, their publishing successes and recognitions makes us consider some interesting points about their literary work. The works of these two writers have been ‘appreciated’ by both the general reading public and by literary theorists and critics. The literary texts by Hakl and Balabán have been widely read which suggests that there is a connection between both writers’ works and their readers on the level of common interest, experience, affection and similarity. The literariness of Hakl's and Balabán's works has been noted and recognized by a number of literary theoreticians and critics which makes us think about the existence of some kind of harmony between the form and the essence of the texts. This gives the writings of both Hakl and Balabán a rather unique position. It is possible to suggest that the popularity and literary 'quality' of Hakl's and Balabán's works lies in their meaning, in the message which they give the world about the world. Nevertheless, it also lies in the way these works speak to and affect their readers. McAfee argues that 'meaning is not made just denotatively, with words denoting thoughts or things. Meaning is made in large part by the poetic and affective aspects of texts as well' (McAfee 2004: 13). The meaning of Hakl's and Balabán's works seems to connect both aspects well. These literary works are entertaining, hence they have an aesthetic value for the reader, but they are also seen as an interesting analysis of the picture which contemporary Czech society creates on the basis of its own experience of the real world and about itself, and so they also have a cognitive value for the reader.

3.2 Secondary literature on Hakl's and Balabán's work

The decision to choose Emil Hakl and Jan Balabán as the two point representatives of contemporary Czech literature and therefore the two subjects of my thesis has been influenced by two main factors. The first factor refers to the authors' personal experience with the time and the place they share(d). To sum up, both Emil Hakl and Jan Balabán were born during communist times and both experienced the political, social and culture transformation of the Czech Republic from communism to a capitalist-orientated state. But whilst Emil Hakl lived through these changes in the Czech capital Prague, Jan Balabán saw them in Ostrava, one of the country's largest industrial agglomerations and prides of the communist regime located in Moravia. These two places play a significant role in their work. In addition, both writers started their writing career after the fall of the communist regime. Both have become known as the authors of fiction, specifically, the authors of fiction inspired by the everyday reality of life in the city and by their own personal (physical and spiritual) life experience of the times, now and before.

The second factor is closely related to all that has been said in the chapter about Hakl's and Balabán's publishing successes and about the public recognition of their work. Critical perceptions of Hakl's and Balabán's works mostly appear in the form of a short review of a single title, as an article commenting on the results of Literary Awards or as an interview with one the writers discussing his personal view on the contemporary world as well as on some topics his narratives explore. More detailed analyses of Hakl's and Balabán's fiction can be found in some Czech literary magazines, such as Aluze, Literární noviny, Tvar and Host, in literary dictionaries such as the already mentioned Slovník české literatury po roce 1945 (The Dictionary of Czech Post-1945 Literature, online dictionary), in collections of literary studies written by Czech literary scholars such as Málková, I: Literární Ostrava (Literary Ostrava) in V srdci Černého pavouka (In the Heart of The Black Spider, 2000) and Urbanová, S: 'Otevřené návraty v prózách Jana Balabána' ('Opened Returns in Balabán's fiction') in I. Málková – S. Urbanová: Souřadnice míst (Places Coordinates, 2003), and in some theses written by Czech and non-Czech university students of literature (see below). The only more complex study about Jan Balabán was written by already mentioned Blanka Kostřicová. There is no complex study of Hakl's works.

To outline some of the views, Ondřej Cakl²⁶ is, for example, looking at Hakl's Konec světa from the perspective of its structure. He explores the link between various situations and the plot, between various situations and the subjectivity of the narrator, between the narrator-actor and the narrator-observer and the rationality and irrationality of his actions. Jiří Trávníček²⁷ is discussing Hakl's work in the context of the literature of the 20th century, particular in the context of works written by Ernest Hemingway, André Gide, Robert Musil, Vladimir Nabokov, Anton Pavlovič Tchechov, Věra Linhartová, Ludvík Vaculík, Bohumil Hrabal, Václav Kahuda and Jáchym Topol and so by writers whose literature is, according to him, built on challenging the non-eventful reality of the everyday world and on the writer's personal drive to create a story even there where there is no major story to be told, and to make it interesting for its readers. Jan Čulík²⁸, Petr Pýcha²⁹ and Tomáš Rákos³⁰ mention the authenticity and the autobiographical inspiration of Hakl's works and Petr Vaněk³¹ appreciates the power of Hakl's storytelling.

Most analyses of Balabán's fiction are also focused on the structure of his narratives rather than on the relationship between the constructed world and the reality of the present times. Ondřej Macura³² refers to the hopelessness of Balabán's characters and their impotence to change it. Miroslav Zelinský³³ talks about the characters' struggle with everyday reality and about the misery and pain these characters experience in their lives when they reach their mid-years. In addition, Tomáš Kubíček³⁴ builds his analysis along the individual characters of Balabán's stories, the storytellers of their internal selves living in the world of today but constantly thinking of their past. Jiří Peňás³⁵ looks at Balabán's work from a slightly different perspective and explores Balabán's almost anatomical work with the structure of his texts which, according to him, deals with moments rather than with the complete stories of individuals' lives. Michal Procházka³⁶ is interested in Balabán's attitude to Ostrava and in his experience of the post-1989 society; Mirek Balašík and Tomáš Reichel³⁷ discuss Balabán's interest in the stories of single characters as well as in the story of the life as a whole and accordingly they refer to Balabán's tendency to shift from writing short stories and novels and vice versa.

Theses written by various university students of Czech literature are also, in the majority, interested in the structure of Hakl's and Balabán's work, particularly in the position of the narrating self and in the position of the characters in general, in the role of the city as a genius loci of their work and in the importance of the time.³⁸ Some of them look at Hakl's and Balabán's work from the perspective of Czech literary tradition and from the perspective of genre. Nevertheless, none of these theses is analyzing Hakl's and Balabán's works from the point of the reality these narratives reflect, these narratives create and the reality that the reader of these narratives re-creates on the basis of his or her knowledge of the world. None of these theses is looking at Hakl's and Balabán's prosaic works in complex and in comparison to each other and the world.³⁹ The analysis I am presenting you is original and unique exactly because it connects all mentioned approaches

³⁹ Petr Šesták's analysis Povídka nebo autobiografická stížnost? Příznačné podoby současné české povídky (A Short Story or an Autobiographical Complaint? Characteristics of Czech Contemporary Stories, 2007) uses approach similar to the approach used in this thesis but focuses on three collections of stories only – on Kateřina Rudčenkova's Noci, noci (Nights, Nights, 2004), Emil Hakl's O létajících objektech (On Flying Objects, 2004) and Jan Balabán's Možná že odcházíme (Maybe We Are Leaving, 2004). together. It is an important contribution to the debate on contemporary Czech literature and its testimony of the world of today.

4. Theoretical background

4.1 General overview

My thesis on the construction of contemporary reality in selected works of Czech fiction consists of two parts: the first part analyzes Emil Hakl's literary works; the second part analyzes the fiction by Jan Balabán. The part focusing on Emil Hakl's work is based on a detailed narrative analysis of a single volume of his writing. Comparisons are then drawn with the whole context of Hakl's fiction – both in relation to the 'real' world and the contemporary 'reality' of Czech writing. The chapter, 'Life according to Jan Beneš, by Emil Hakl', explores these literary texts as the story of one character and his perception of life around him. This is because I believe and would like to prove that the whole of Hakl's fiction is a variation on one individual life – Jan Beneš's life. It deals with the transformations of Jan's life. The volume entitled Konec světa (The End of the World, 2001) is looked at from the perspective of the identity of this character in relation to the process of narration, the identity of this character in relation to the author, the character's 'I' in relation to his image of the outer world, the character's 'I' and his acceptance or non-acceptance of the world and the character's 'I' and his perception of being within the world and being the self. The identity of Jan Beneš is then analysed from the perspective of his awareness of the self, of his body, of his actions and of his mind, as it reacts and interacts with the world. A psychoanalytical approach to the human being has proved useful here.

Jan Beneš's position within the world is also considered externally in relation to the position of other characters and to the multi-perspective and multi-dimensional reality of the modern world – his world which shows that nothing is stable and everything flows, that nothing is certain and everything is fragmented. In this section, the thesis follows the ideas which have been formulated by the scholars responding to the theory of post-structuralism, or rather to the theory based on the deconstruction of a text (Jacques Derrida, Luce Irigaray, Geoffrey Hartman). It is these theoreticians who claim that our life does not consist of stable meanings or concepts in other words, but of a constant play of signifiers which differ from each other by the nature of their existence within the language and the human mind. According to Derrida, there is no possibility of a pure presence in each event and therefore no possibility of a single meaning of each event. As a result, any experience, any truth, any concept is then constituted and comprehended linguistically and in terms of its oppositions: presence/absence, life/death, body/mind, interior/exterior, marginal/central etc. (Derrida 1981: 26). In Derrida's view, in each presence of things there is also an absence of things and there is no superiority in those. Both present and absent coexist (Ibid: 41). It is the interaction between these opposites in perception of the human mind that creates a variety of different meanings and it depends on each individual what perspective he/she chooses to apply in order to understand it. Within these concepts, Jan Beneš's perception of the world is also analyzed – from one perspective, his own perspective, yet acknowledging that this view is not the only one view that influences the individual's narrative of the world but that it is also influenced by the interplay of various other, at the first sight not always visible, contexts which the contemporary world signifies (perspectives applied by other characters, another fictive reality, binary opposites etc.) and which language captures.

Further in the line, this thesis also explores possible interactions between Hakl's texts and texts created by various other sources and, on the basis of these findings, it reconstructs their fictive-real. The thesis is guided in this by the theory on intertextuality, specifically by the theoretical work of Julia Kristeva. It is Kristeva who, influenced by Bakhtin's work, The Dialogic Imagination (1975), and his theory on textual dialogism, considers texts also in terms of their relationship with other texts: '[A]ny text is constructed as a mosaic of quotations..., any text is the absorption and transformation of another' (Kristeva 1980: 66). According to Kristeva, each text is a dialogue between all its characters, between its characters, its author and its readers, and between the text and all other texts that the text absorbed in the process of its creation, including the social and ideological reality of the outside world (Ibid.). In these terms, Hakl's Konec světa is also seen as a possible mosaic of other texts – a mosaic of other literary and non-literary contexts.

Finally, Hakl's Jan Beneš is also assessed in relation to the author – Jan Beneš-the character/the actor in relation to Jan Beneš-the writer, his own experience of the 'real' world and the reader's perception of it. The autobiographical aspect will be considered here.

The part of the thesis dedicated to Balabán's fiction is structured differently, just as Balabán's fiction is structured differently. Here, the thesis does not analyze the identity of one single narrating character, as there is no single acting and thinking persona framing all Balabán's texts, but there are many who contribute to it. It analyzes all Balabán's texts as they expand on individual themes and on a variety of individual characters. It explores various situations as they appear and re-appear in the lives of Balabán's male and female characters. It considers how Balabán's texts touch upon human relationships, erotic love, family and friendship and how they see their position in the world and in the whole universe. This is because I believe that these texts are built more on certain situations rather than on the significance of individual characters.

In the analysis of the texts by Jan Balabán, semiotics is also used as the main theoretical approach to the narrative. The analysis focuses on the interplay between narrating characters and their non-narrating counterparts and on the way they all occupy or swap their positions and roles both in a given moment, in a given situation and in sequence. This is one of the key bits of information for understanding the structure and dynamics of Balabán's fictive world. However, the analysis of Balabán's fiction is, more than in Hakl's case, influenced by psychoanalysis, especially in the parts focused on love and family relationships (as these are one of the main themes of Balabán's fiction), and by the theory of deconstruction – especially in those parts where it discusses the multiplicity of individuals' testimonies and their perception of the world in terms of binary opposites. Also, in the case of Balabán's fiction, the analysis considers the relationship between the writer's experience of his own life and the fictive reality of his texts. This is because autobiographical inspiration in Balabán's fiction, as in Hakl's fiction, is undeniable.

The final part of this thesis is comparative and conclusive. In its last chapter, the thesis summarizes the previously carried out analysis of Emil Hakl's and Jan Balabán's work, compares their forms of delivery and contemplates their testimonies about the world and to the world. It discusses their work in the context of contemporary Czech culture and in the context of a social reality these texts reflect upon, construct and reconstruct. Here, the thesis answers to a literary approach introduced by the theoreticians of New Historicism (e. g. Louis Montrose, Hayden White).⁴⁰ New Historicism argues that literary texts can tell us something about the interplay of discourses and about the meanings that operate in society in the time and place in which the texts were written and in which the texts were read. 'Writing and reading are always historically and socially determinate events, performed in the world and upon the world by gendered individual and collective human agents' argues Montrose, a representative of New Historicism, and he adds that 'our analysis and our understandings necessarily proceed from our own historically, socially and institutionally shaped vantage points; that the histories we reconstruct are the textual constructs of critics who are, ourselves, historical objects' (both Montrose 1989: 23). In other words, he argues that the writing and the reading of texts is a form of momentary construction and reconstruction of one's history and one's present life. Similarly, he states that literary texts, as a representation of human experience at a given time and place, shape and are shaped by their historical contexts – they are an interpretation of history. Likewise, they also believe that our interpretations of literature shape and are shaped by the culture in which we live – they are also an interpretation of history (the writer's and ours).

In accordance with the theory of New Historicism, Hakl's and Balabán's works are also seen as interpretations of history and therefore also interpretations of culture. This is because they themselves construct their own fictive world by using discourses existing at the time they were written and, at the same time, they also create one of those discourses. The aim of this thesis is to explore how the interpretation of Hakl's and Balabán's works shapes the interpretation of the time and the culture in which these works were written and the interpretation of the time and the culture in which we live. In other words, the aim of this thesis is to explore how the interpretation of Hakl's and Balabán's works shapes the interpretation of Czech reality in which these works were written and in which we currently live.

4.2 The subject and the object of narration

Semiotic analysis of Hakl's and Balabán's fiction is built on the theory of narratology. To define narratology – it is a study that explores the form of the narrative and its functioning, whilst narrative is the 'representation of real or fictive events and situations in a time sequence' (Prince 1982:1). For the purpose of my thesis, I have chosen two approaches to narrative which I believe can be used on Hakl's and Balabán's fiction: the approach introduced by Gerald Prince and the approach introduced by Mieke Bal.

According to Prince, narrative is a collection of signs which, under certain circumstances and in certain combination, represent the narrating activity, its origin and destination, and other signs which constitute the narrated. Henceforth, narrative can be explored from the point of its narrativity – from the point of the narrator (the one who narrates), the narratee (the one who is narrated to – a character, a reader) and the narration (the fact of narrating) – and from the point of the narrated (the events – time, space).

In Prince's view, the narrator may or may not be explicitly designated by an 'I'. But 'any sign in a narration which represents a narrator's persona, his attitude, his knowledge of worlds other than that of the narrated, or his interpretation of the events recounted and evaluation of their importance constitutes a sign of the “I” (Ibid: 10). These signs then determine the degree of the narrator’s intrusiveness, his/her level of self-consciousness, his/her reliability and a position (distance) in the events he/she tells. Accordingly, this narrator may also play a different role in the events he/she tells. This depends on the distance he/she applies in the process of narration. The narrator can be a protagonist of the story (the narrating character), an important character, a minor one or just an observer of the events he/she recounts (external narrator). He/she can be the only narrator of the events or can alternate with a number of other narrators.

The same differentiation can also be, according to Prince, applied on the narratee and so on the one who is narrated to. Also the narratee may be a character, may play no role of an audience (external narratee), may play several other roles or may function as a narrator (narrating narratee). He/she may be addressed as a group or as an individual.

The narratee’s identity is formed by the knowledge the narrator has about the narratee and by the distance the narrator applies in his/her narration (Ibid: 16-25). Only by recognizing this relationship between the narrator and the narratee we can understand the narratee and his/her significance and role; only by this we can understand the narrative and its testimony to the world.

What then comes out from the Prince’s study is knowing that what is important in the narrative is not whether the narrator of the story is ‘I’ or someone else but what is his /her position within the narrated world and what is his/her attitude towards the represented world. In other words, how the narrative is constructed. What is important in the narrative is the relationship between the narrator and his/her narratees and the relationship between narratees themselves. Again, what is important is the role individual narratees play in the events within the given frame of time and space (the narrated).

A different approach to narrative is applied by Mieke Bal. In her study of narratology (Naratology, Introduction to the Theory of Narrative, 2009), she does not rely on the narrative theory of two-pillars only but, instead, she distinguishes three layers of narrative: the text, which is formed by the speaker’s activity, the fabula, which is shaped by the actor’s activity, and the story, which is built on individual characters. For this purpose, Bal also uses the term of the narrator, the actor of the event and the focalizer or the preceptor of the story. According to her, it is the narrator who is ‘the most central concept in the analysis of narrative text’ (Bal 2009: 18). His/her identity, ‘the degree to which and the manner in which that identity is indicated in the text, and the choices that are implied, lend the text its specific character’ (Ibid.). Focalizer is, on the other hand, ‘the represented colouring of the fabula by a specific agent of perception, the holder of the point of view' (Ibid.). Both the narrator and the focalization then determine the narrative situation.

The narrator of the text, or the speaker, is the holder of the voice by which the story is formulated and passed to its readers. The focalizer is the point from which various elements of the story are seen. This could be a character of the story or someone outside it. By this distinction, the narrator is then the one who works with the language and, by uttering the language, he/she shapes the story of the text. The focalizer is the one by whom the story is perceived. The actor/agent is the one who shapes the story by his or her actions.

Mieke Bal distinguishes two types of the narrator and two types of the focalizer. She talks about the external narrator and the character-bound narrator, and about the external focalizer and the character-bound focalizer. According to her, grammatically the narrator is always 'a first person', the 'I'. The difference between 'I' lies in the 'object of the utterance' (Ibid.: 21): the external narrator (EF) tells the story from the outside (e. g. 'Emil Hakl is a Czech writer.') whilst the character-bound narrator (CN) speaks about himself as about the agent of the story (e. g. 'I am a researcher.'). Similarly, the external focalizer (EF) represents the external point of view (e. g. 'Emil Hakl received a literary award.') whilst the character-bound focalizer (CN) represents the internal view. This internal view can be given by 'I' (e. g. 'I saw Emil Hakl after he received a literary award. I was there.'), or by someone else (e. g. 'My friend saw Emil Hakl after he received a literary award. My friend was there.').

We can see that what Bal's and Prince's theories have in common is their emphasis on the role the narrator plays within the narrated world and on his/her knowledge of the events he/she recounts. To determine this, Prince uses the term 'narratee'. Narratee is the object of the narration and so the one through whom we perceive the narrative. He/she is the one who creates the story by his/her actions and thoughts. Bal, on the other hand, uses for the same purposes the term 'focalizer'. 'Focalizer' is, according to her, the one the story focuses on and also the one through whom we perceive the narrative.

Both Prince's and Bal's approach that emphasizes the role of the narratee/the focalizer as well as the role of the narrator will be used in my thesis on Hakl's and Balabán's fiction. This is because I believe that it is both the narrator and the narratee/the focalizer who stand in the centre of the narrative. However, the narrator's voice is the one who invites the narratee/the focalizer into the world of fiction. Bal's theory will prove useful in the chapters describing the relationship between the narrator, the focalizer and the characters of analyzed narratives; Prince's theory will help to determine various aspects of the story itself.

4.3 Characters

To determine the significance of each character and the role they play in the narrated world is as important as the process of defining the position the narrator occupies in the narrative and his/her relationship to the story he/she tells. Daniela Hodrová, whose thesis proves useful for the analysis of the characters in Balabán's and Hakl's works, in her study ...na okraji chaosu (...on the Edge of Chaos, 2001) is of the same view and so she analyzes various forms and positions the characters occupy in the course of each narration. In order to do so, she distinguishes between the character-type and the character-function, between the character-definition and the character-hypothesis, between the character-subject and the character-object; and between the character-real and the character-fictive. To address all four distinctions in their contradictory positions, she looks at various aspects of the character's subjectivity and she does it from several perspectives.

Hodrová begins her analysis by emphasizing the individuality of each character. She states that the character is a certain type of subject (the other subjects are the author and the reader), 'who is a textual parallel to the human being, real or fictive... in the literary work' ['který je v díle textovou analogií člověka, skutečného nebo smyšleného']. In such individuality, the character also bears certain features, certain states and actions. In other words, the character bears an individual mind which has been built on 'his/her relationship to others, to the world, to the object' ['vztahu druhým, ke světu, k objektu'] (both Hodrová 2001: 545).

By his/her position, the character belongs to the world of fiction. Henceforth, he/she cannot be completely real. The character can overlap his/her real models but he/she can never cover them completely. In this sense, 'the character always remains more or less hypothetical in spite of the fact that his/her model was a real person' ['literární postava... zůstává tedy vždy v té či oné míře hypotetická, i když je jejím předobrazem skutečná osoba'] (Ibid: 550-551). It does not mean, however, that the real is not considered in fiction any more. On the contrary, this hypothetical approach, in Hodrová's view, 'contributes to the creation of a more complex, multidimensional image of the real world which is captured in all its possibilities, and in a person who is the sum total of all his/her potential Is and predicaments. It is an attempt to search for a more complex truth' ['hypotetizace (...) namnoze přispívá k vytvoření komplexnějšího, vícedimenzionálního obrazu reality, uchopené současně v jejích možnostech, člověkem v souboru jeho potenciálních já a osudů, je pokusem o hledání úplnější pravdy’] (Ibid: 552). What Hodrová practically means by this is that a hypothetical approach enables the author/the reader to create a hypothesis about the fictive world and, through this world, a hypothesis about what we perceive as the real world. A hypothetical approach opens the author’s/the reader’s eyes by offering him/her an indefinite number of various truths in which none of them is absolute and none of them is false (but relative). A hypothetical approach does not exclude reality but offers different views on what is real and what is fictive – something that has been explored since the discovery of the relativity of things.

Drawing on her hypothetical approach, Hodrová further distinguishes between two different categories of characters: the character-definition and the character-hypothesis. The character-definition is the character which has already been defined, the character-schema, the character without secret. This type of the character has often been used in literature that has been written in the name of certain ideology (religious, political, social) or in the name of entertainment (romance, detective story, traveller’s diary etc) and, therefore, in the literature that has sought only one solution and one truth. The character-definition serves the idea and the purpose, not the individual’s imagination. The character-hypothesis, on the other hand, cannot be considered as something finished which would have been transferred to the literary work in the moment of its creation. ‘The character-hypothesis is a silhouette, a torso which appears in the work in its undefined and fragmented form and which the author tries to reconstruct in his or her text. In spite of that, the whole of the character still disappears somewhere in infinity. The work always refers to the world outside the text’ [‘postava-hypotéza... je jako silueta, torzo, které se v této neurčité a fragmentární podobě objevuje v díle a které se autor pokouší... v textu rekonstruovat, celek postavy se však i na konci jakoby ztrácí v nekonečnu, dílo odkazuje mimo text’] (Ibid: 556). According to Hodrová, the author is using the concept of the character-hypothesis in order to capture a process of human thinking as something unfinished and chaotic, ‘a process which can be “truthfully” (in all relativity of this word) portrayed only when it is portrayed in its process, in its continuously escaping, undefined and incomplete totality’ [‘process... “pravdivě” (při vší relativitě tohoto pojmu) zobrazitelný právě jen v jeho procesuálnosti, v jeho stále unikající, neurčité a neúplné totalitě’] (Ibid: 556-557). And once again, we have to add that it is not only the author who is using the concept of the character-hypothesis to construct the story he/she writes but also the reader who is thinking about the character and about the hypothesis when searching for the identity of each character and his/her position within the world of fiction and, potentially, also within the modern world.

In this sense, the hypothetical approach to the fictive reality and to all its actors is the only one that can explore the vast diversity of contemporary literature and, potentially, the reality of the modern world in all its relativity, multiplicity and its chaotic nature. The concept of the character-definition is the one which, by showing only one truth, denies recognizing this.

Within her discussion on the hypothetical approach to the literature, Hodrová also distinguishes between the character-type and the character-function, the character-subject and the character-object, and the character-fictive and the character-real. With the first distinction, Hodrová points out that, in fiction, the character is a bearer of certain social rules which he/she stands for (the character-type e. g. aristocrat, labourer, dandy, loser, doctor, lover) but the role he/she plays in the narrative may lead him/her to various directions and sites (the character-function). By the second distinction, Hodrová emphasizes the role the character plays within the narrative. He/she can be either the bearer of the action (the subject) or its receptor (the object). The third distinction thinks about the external reality and its influence on the world of fiction and vice versa (see below).

Who Hakl's and Balabán's characters are and what role these characters play within the world they shape will be explored throughout the whole thesis by using Hodrová's hypotheses. What their testimony is to the modern world will be considered as the outcome of this research.

4.4 Author - Narrator - Protagonist (Character)

By now, we have defined the position which the narrator of the story and its characters (its protagonists) hold in the narrative of literary texts. To complete the whole process of preparation for the main analysis of Hakl's and Balabán's texts, we have to look at one more objective and that is the connection between the author, the narrator and the protagonist of the text.

First, we have to establish who the author of a literary text is. The author is a person who writes and publishes books. In other words, the author is a real person who is responsible for producing a new discourse; he/she is the connection between the world that lies beyond the text and the world that lies within the text. The author is also the name that appears on the cover of the book. In the majority of literary works, this name is identical with the name of the real person. However, there are also authors who publish their books under another name, their pseudonym or their pen name. Both the real name and the pseudonym are names of the real person. The author, however, is the one whose name is representing the book.

When discussing the author of the text, the narrator of the text and the characters of the text, literary theory points out significant shifts that occur in their position within their mutual world. Literary scholars recognize connections that work on different levels between all these subjects of the text, and they demonstrate it on various literary genres and styles. These scholars then speak about differences between autobiography, biography, memoir, diary, literary fiction etc.

The literary scholar, Philippe Lejeune, defines autobiography as ‘a retrospective prose narrative written by a real person concerning his own existence, where the focus is his individual life, in particular the story of his personality’ (Lejeune 2007: 298). He adds that the name of ‘the author, the narrator, and the protagonist must be identical’ (Ibid: 299). If any of those requirements is not met, then, according to Lejeune, we cannot talk about autobiography but about the diary (no retrospective point of narrative), memoir (subject of the text is not a story of personality but a story of the times), literary fiction (there is no identity between the name of the author and the narration) or biography (the name of the narrator and the name of the main protagonist are not identical) (Ibid.).

In autobiography, the identity of the narrator and of the main protagonist of the text, in the majority of cases, is reached by the use of first person perspective – the ‘I’.⁴¹ It is then the reader who, based on his/her knowledge of the text, establishes a connection that exists between this ‘I’ and the personality of the author. Once again, it is Philippe Lejeune who recognizes two ways of establishing this identity: it can be done implicitly, when the first person refers to the name of the author (e. g. ‘this is the story of my life’) or when the first person enters the text by acting as if he/she were the author of the text, and in an obvious way, when the narrator and the protagonist are given the name of the author (Ibid: 308-309). According to Lejeune, the reader does not have to go to the outer world to determine whether there is an ‘identity’ between the name of the ‘I’ of the text and the name of the author, as it is the text itself that offers him or her all the answers he or she needs to know (Ibid.). On the other hand, we should add that the reader does have to go to the world that lies beyond the text in order to determine whether there is any 'resemblance' between the narrator, the protagonist of the text, and its author, in case the identity of all three subjects is not reached.

Such literary texts in which the reader, based on his/her knowledge of the outer reality and the text, sees the resemblance between the fictive and the real world, are not autobiographies but they can be classified as 'autobiographical fiction', or as fiction inspired by the author's personal history and life. Autobiographical fiction is therefore the case where the author, the narrator and the main protagonist of the text are not identical but where the reader suspects that there is a certain degree of resemblance between the author and the narration. This also refers to cases where the narrator and the main protagonist of the text carry the name by which the reader recognizes the real name of the person who is hidden behind the pseudonym, the pen name that is used as the name of the author of the book. The identity between the author and the narration is not reached here; however, a certain degree of resemblance can be determined.

The difference between the autobiography and the autobiographical fiction arises from the difference between the 'identity' and the 'resemblance' of the text which the reader recognizes in the process of reading the text. The difference between any form of fiction, biography, and autobiography comes with the fact that both biography and autobiography are referential texts. The aim of the fiction is not primarily to provide an image of the real world; the main aim of the fiction is to entertain (and engage) the reader by taking him or her on the journey through the discovery of the fictive world.

Nevertheless, we must also not forget that, despite the identity and the non-identity of the text with the real world and despite the resemblance and the non-resemblance of the text with the real world, fiction, as much as autobiography and biography, is also a representation of the real world and a way into the life of the others. After all, we read because we want to know the worlds of other people outside of our own little space. Literature, in general, provides us this access to the world(s) of the others.

In fiction, the resemblance between the real and the fictive world can be identified only by the reader and his/her knowledge of the outer world; it is not what the text primarily and obviously seeks. To what degree the reader sees the fictive world as the image of the real world is fully up to the reader himself/herself and his/her perception of both the fictive and the real world. Primarily, fiction relies on the fantasy of the reader, and thereafter on his/her knowledge of the world.

As opposed to fiction, both autobiography and biography ‘claim to provide information about a reality exterior to the text... Their aim is not simple verisimilitude, but resemblance to the truth. Not “the effect of the real,” but the image of the real’ (Ibid: 316). But, whilst autobiography requires the identity of the author and the narration, biography is based on the author’s knowledge of another real person. It is then another real person who is the object of his/her narration, not the author himself/herself. The author of autobiographical text provides the reader with the story of his/her own life and his/her own personality; the aim of the author of biographical texts is to provide the reader with a history of another person and a history of the world this person lived.

In the same way as we have analyzed the difference between the autobiography and the (autobiographical) fiction, and between autobiography and biography, we would be able to continue with other literary styles which, up to a certain degree, play with the idea of the identity/resemblance of the author, the narrator and the main protagonist of the text. However, as the main purpose of this research is the analysis of Hakl’s and Balabán’s fiction, we would focus only on this fiction, on their possible ‘resemblance’ with the world of both the above authors and on their effect on the reader’s perception of the world. To anticipate, this is because in both Hakl’s and Balabán’s fiction we can trace a certain resemblance between the author and the narrator.

Finally, it is important to point out that all translations of Hakl’s and Balabán’s fiction and other texts used in this study have been made especially for the purposes of this work. This is because, apart from Hakl’s novella, O rodičích a dětech (Of Kids and Parents), English translations of Hakl’s and Balabán’s fiction were not available.

I. 'Life according to Jan Beneš' by Emil Hakl

Introduction

'It was my greatest desire to pick myself up and get out of the city early in the morning. But by the time the alarm clock went, it turned eleven, by the time I was finishing my cup of coffee, it turned half past two, by the time Pavlik pressed the doorbell, it turned four. From the way the light landed on my curtains, I guessed it must be a beautiful day outside. Pavlik and I both drank an extra cup of strong coffee and then set out for a stroll.

In front of the greengrocers next door, we saw a two-hundred-kilos weighing gypsy man, a shop manager hanging about and smoking, fully concentrated on his cigarette. He was trying to scratch his back but with little success. A radio was booming from the inside of the shop. The deregulation of the rental costs was again postponed, indefinitely. The gross domestic product has dropped by two tenths of a per cent. The sign, Emil's Greengrocers, was manually painted on a black gable. Around the contorted letters decorated in an oriental style, dreamy kohlrabies, bananas, radishes and sickly looking, translucent pineapples levitated, and millions of midges sat on shrunken celeries and carrots displayed behind the shop window. The air was full of radiant dust and fluff. Illuminated by the sun, the television tower stood ankle-deep in the paddling pool of houses, as though it was a feature from a book by Jules Verne. As if Verne's Steel City began to rise from there, from somewhere in the mists above the Žižkov hillside.

Pavlik yawned: "Let's have a pint somewhere..."

The world around was drowning in ceaseless conversation. Restless, buzzing vapour of talk was hovering above the continents. The ether was packed with useless information. It was indescribably pleasant to go for a pint with Pavlik and drink it with him in silence.'

['Mojí největší touhou bylo sebrat se a hned ráno vypadnout z města. Ale když zařinčel budík, bylo jedenáct, když jsem dopíjel kafe, bylo půl třetí, a když zazvonil Pavlik, byly čtyři. Podle toho, jak světlo dopadalo na závěs v pokoji, musel být venku nádherný den. Vypil jsem s Pavlikem ještě jednoho turka a vyšli jsme na ulici.

Před zeleninou ve vedlejším baráku postával vedoucí, dvoumetrákový cikán, zhluboka kouřil a marně se snažil poškrábat na zádech. Z nitra krámu dunělo rádio. Deregulace nájemného byla opět odložena na neurčito. Hrubý domácí produkt klesl o dvě desetiny procenta. Na černém, ručně malovaném štítu byl vyveden nápis Zelenina u Emila. Kolem pokroucených, orientálně zdobných písmen levitovaly zasněžené kedlubny, banány, ředkvičky a ananasy, neduživé a průsvitné, a na scvrklých celerech a mrkvičkách ve výloze posedávaly miliony drobounkých mušek. With these words, Emil Hakl opens Konec světa (The End of the World, henceforth KS). The very first sentence of the first text in this volume pre-signifies the tone that will become an important characteristic feature of the whole book and, later, also of the whole literary output by Emil Hakl. For, as we will soon discover, all Hakl's narratives, no matter if they are short stories collected in a single volume or if they are novels, are connected by one and the same narrating character (narrator), Jan Beneš. Some of the narratives take place in his active presence (e. g. the nine stories of Konec světa), others are hidden behind the narrating voice of another character (e.g. Lád'a in 'Lád'ovo poslední tango'). How these narratives work in relation to the subject of the narration, to the reality they construct and in relation to the readers will be discussed in the following chapters.

‘It was my greatest desire to pick myself up and get out of the city early in the morning.’ [‘Mojí největší touhou bylo sebrat se a hned ráno vypadnout z města.’]
(KS: 5)

What we have here is the narrating character using the first person perspective and the means of internal monologue to express his desire to leave the city. And what is the city? A greengrocer's, a shop down the street, a gypsy man, a booming radio, deregulated rent prices, the GDP, the television tower and radiant dust. The suburban areas (with the television tower) resembling Jules Verne's 'Steel Town'⁴² bathed in the misty sunlight. This all makes up the atmosphere of the city which the narrator of this passage sees, feels and describes as he walks through it. It is this narrator's own, subjective, visual and auditory perception of the city which functions as a background for the story that starts and continues with his 'I', moving about in the streets of Žižkov (historically a working class district of Prague, nowadays a socially and economically diverse district with many old buildings under reconstruction and with new modern cafés, restaurants and shops being built; also known for a large number of pubs, strip clubs, brothels and cheap bars)⁴³ and its localities. Such a city is also contained within his eyes and ears. Through his subjective testimony, we see that it is a place of various colours and noises and words; a chaos in which it was still ‘incredibly pleasant to enjoy a beer with Pavlik and drink it with him in silence’ (see above). Our character is completely swallowed up by the atmosphere of the place and yet he desires to escape from it. He wants to abandon the city but, instead, he walks about within it. He lets himself be surrounded by the city’s striking narratives and yet he enjoys a drink in a silent place. All that comes afterwards happens within the constraints of these contradictions. The character’s ‘I’ is considered within these texts as being in harmony with the world and, at the same time, in conflict with it; as being a part of it as well as outside it; as being in harmony and, at the same, time in conflict with the ‘orderly’, and the ‘chaotic’, the ‘fictive-real’ and the ‘fictive-imaginary’.

⁴² The reference is to Jules Verne's (1828-1905) novel The Begum's Fortune (1879). Stahlstadt ('Steel Town') is the place where the whole narrative of Verne's novel unfolds. The narrator of this story describes the town in the following words: 'In five years there sprang up on this bare and rocky plain eighteen villages, composed of small wooden houses, all alike, brought ready built from Chicago, and containing a large population of rough workmen. In the midst of these villages, at the very foot of the Coal Butts, as the inexhaustible mountains of coal are called, rises a dark mass, huge, and strange, an agglomeration of regular buildings, pierced with symmetrical windows, covered with red roofs, and surmounted by a forest of cylindrical chimneys which continually vomit forth clouds of dense smoke. Through the black curtain which veils the sky, dart red lightning-like flames, while a distant roaring is heard resembling that of thunder or the beating of the surf on a rocky shore.' (Verne 2003: 65) It is possible that the narrator of Konec světa sees Prague (specifically the district of Žižkov) in that particular moment through the image of Verne's Stahlstadt. However, it is also possible that he refers to the Czech film adaptation of Verne's novel called Tajemství Ocelového města (The Mystery of the Steel City, 1979, directed by Ludvík Ráža) and that he sees Prague (specifically the district of Žižkov) in that particular moment with the same eyes with which the main character of the film sees, for the first time, Steel City – misty, yellowish grey, smokey and mysterious.

In an attempt to capture the reality of Hakl’s narratives, we will discuss the nature of these contradictions as well as the way they shape both the narrating self and the narrative discourse, and therefore the world they construct.

Hakl’s first prose work, Konec světa, published in 2001, will serve as a point of departure for my analysis. This will start with the narrating self.

⁴³ Žižkov is also known for the following sights: Žižkov Television Tower, Jan Žižka Monument (Jan Žižka was a Hussite military leader), Olšany Cemetery (the largest graveyard in Prague) and New Jewish Cemetery (the burial place of Franz Kafka).

1. The narrator and the main protagonist of Hakl's texts

1.1 The acting and narrating self

'I was passing Mostecká Street when Renata appeared, suddenly, walking towards me dressed in a flapping skirt. Like two individuals lost somewhere in a desert, we greeted each other and then we went for a drink.

She told me all about London, how busy the city was. How she went to a pub there, but it wasn't a pub, it was rather a wailing cave; everyone was dressed like a sinner who had been sent to hell, all were drunk and stoned, unable to recognize who they were. Cages were hanging down from the ceiling above their heads and naked girls were sitting in those cages. And how everywhere she went people said, "Hey, it's not really our problem, but you shouldn't be taking so much of the stuff, see, you are in overdrive". And how she said, taking what, how much of what, and they said, well, you know, it's crystal clear ...'

['Šel jsem Mosteckou, a najednou jsem uviděl proti sobě rázovat Renatu ve vlající sukni. Přivítali jsme se jako dva ztracení na poušti a šli to zapít.

Vyprávěla mi o Londýně, jak to tam žilo. Jak tam přišla do hospody, ale nebyla to hospoda, byla to spíš jeskyně nářků: všichni tam byli oháknutí jako hříšníci v pekle, sjetí a zkouření, že nevěděli, čím jsou, a nad hlavami se jim houpaly na stropě zavěšené klece a v těch klecích seděly nahaté holky. A jak jí všude, kam přišla, říkali: hele, ty, nic nám do toho není, ale neměla bys toho tak hrozně moc brát, dyť seš rozjetá jako vlak, a jak ona řkala: a čeho jako brát, co brát, a oni říkali: no dyť víš, dyť je to jasný...'] (KS: 50-51).

As we have already outlined, each story that is told is mediated by the narrative discourse. In the world of literary fiction, a story is constructed by a voice (the narrator), a style of writing (the writer) and by the reader's interpretations (Abbott 2002: 17). The voice in the passage quoted above belongs to a man speaking about his experience from the first person perspective ('I was passing...'). It is his voice that takes us into the internal world of the main character and his perception of what is happening around. It would be, therefore, crucial 'to determine the kind of person we have for a narrator because this lets us know just how [he] injects into the narration [his] own needs and desires and limitations, and whether we should fully trust the information we are getting' (Abbott 2002: 65-66). And I will add that it would be crucial to determine the kind of person we have for the main character of Hakl's text because he is the person through whom we perceive the reality of the narrated world.

Hakl's narrator of both above examples belongs to the narrated world; he lives within it together with many other characters which appear in the story – he is the narrating 'I' of Hakl's text as well as its main protagonist. As such, he tells the stories that he himself has had a chance to experience, either at the given moment or earlier. He also tells the stories which he has heard from other characters. He presents these stories as his own acts of perception. The 'I' in Konec světa is the actor, a persona actively participating in the world in which he lives ('I was passing Mostecká Street'); the 'I' is the narrator and the observer of all that is happening ('when Renata appeared, suddenly'); the 'I' is a thinker, a philosopher of his own mind (he develops various theories about human existence, about society, about Europe) and finally, also, the 'I' is the mediator of other people's thoughts and speech ('She told me all about London...'), even when his own presence hides behind another voice.

Each 'I' that functions in Haki's narratives represent a different role that the narrating character of Haki's text holds within the process of narration. We will examine how these individual roles work and interact on the level of the narrative discourse and also how they impact on our understanding of the world which is being constructed by the narration.

1.2 The narrator of Konec světa: 'I' as I see myself

We have determined that the narrator of Haki's Konec světa is a man. He is Jan Beneš, the narrating 'I' and the acting 'I' of the story he shares with us. He lives in Prague. The time is the end of the 20th century and the first years of the 21st century. Apart from this, what else do we know about him? How does he present himself to the reader? What is his place in the world he creates and perceives? What testimony about his world does he provide?

Jan Beneš's perception of his own personality is created in interaction with the world in which he lives. His personality develops from numerous encounters with other people – with women, with his friends, with his family and with random people – and from the situations to which these encounters lead him. At the same time, his personality is also shaped by his own perception of himself and by his doubts about whether it is true. This is again happening within a process of comparing contradictions of different conflicting visions – 'I' as 'I see myself', 'I' as 'I am seen by others'; 'I' as 'I articulate myself within the world', 'I' as 'I listen to the world and to all it says about me'; and finally, 'I' as what 'I want from life' and 'I' as 'what I should be wanting from life'. All these different approaches confuse Beneš's internal world and the process of construction of his external reality. All these different approaches have the greatest impact on his personal relationships, on his work and on his overall attitude to society (not just Czech/Czechoslovak society) and what should be the individual's place within it.

Jan Beneš is about 40 years old. He lives alone or occasionally with his friends, partners or random people. As far as we learn from this particular book, he is divorced and open to sexual relationships with women. He works and he does not work; he enjoys and at the same time dislikes being with friends. He enjoys and dislikes being alone. He likes and dislikes his own self. Whenever he looks at himself, it is more with emphasized disgust and irony than with self-confidence, but also with a certain degree of personal satisfaction and acceptance. The image he draws of himself is always quite raw, quite bitter and certainly far from any iconic glossy magazine model of male beauty. On one occasion he describes, in quite an expressive manner, his image reflected in the mirror:

‘I was horrified. I saw a swollen baby, ninety-kilos of weight. A larva with a shaven, rapidly blinking human head attached to it. I saw a bald creature insulting Mother Nature’s honest intentions.’

[‘Zděsil jsem se. Uviděl jsem napuchlé devadesátikilové nemluvně. Moučného červa s přimontovanou ostříhanou, rychle mrkající lidskou hlavou. Uviděl jsem jakousi lysou kreaturu, urážející poctivé záměry matky přírody.’] (KS: 209).

Or elsewhere, this time at a countryside pond where he goes for a swim, he says:

‘It came to my mind that, for the female part of the audience, I should pull my stomach back, at least a little bit. But I decided I would not give a damn. It was one of those moments when there was no point in pretending.’

[‘Napadlo mě, že bych s ohledem na dívčí část obecnstva mohl alespoň trochu zatáhnout břicho, ale hned jsem se na to vykašlal. Byl to jeden z momentů, kdy nestojí za to nic předstírat.’] (KS: 46-47)

When Beneš talks about his body, he uses the image of a ‘larva’ or, to be more literal, the image of a ‘flour-beetle’ (see below), a beast which he regards as something quite ugly, shapeless and fat; as something that is not pleasant to see. Even more, he says that he is ‘horrified’ by the image of himself he sees in the mirror. Nevertheless, one thing is the way Beneš describes himself (in a negative manner), the other is what he does with his perception of the self and how he confronts it and, as it seems, he does not confront it at all. Instead, he turns his head away in a gesture of a careless man:

‘Instead I pushed Radka back into her bed and once more jumped in that warm pool.’

[‘Raději jsem dostrkal Radku k posteli a skočil zase zpátky do té zahřáté tůně.’] (KS: 209)

In the bed, Beneš behaves in a resigned manner, just like when he went swimming: instead of pulling his belly back, he decides to ignore it.

Beneš uses a mirror, water or other people's eyes to reflect upon his own image but, no less importantly, also upon his own behaviour. After one of his drinking nights, he pulls out a kitchen knife and wants to stick it into his friend because he had vomited on his books. Immediately thereafter, his thoughts turn inside and against his own actions. Suddenly, he reflects on what he has tried to do, criticizing himself for his selfish behaviour:

[‘Co seš to za hovado, říkal jsem si. Knihy jsou ti bližší než člověk, říkal jsem si. Než kamarád.’] (KS: 62-63)

Elsewhere, we learn about Beneš from a dialogue he leads with some of the people he encounters:

“But Honza, you mustn't be alone. Loneliness is not good for you.”
“Why do you think that?”
“Because, when you're alone, you are incapable of being happy. (...) Especialy you! When you're alone, you are almost invisible! When you're alone, you hardly exist!”
[„Honza, ale. Ty nesmíš být sám. Samota pro tebe není dobrá.“ „Proč myslíš?“ „Protože když ty sám, nejsi schopen být šťastný.“ (...) „Speciálně ty! Když ty sám, ty nejsi vidět skoro! Když ty sám, tak skoro vůbec nejsi!“] (KS: 23)

To want to pull in one's stomach and not to do it, to want to attack a friend for his careless behaviour and not to, and to seek out loneliness while he thinks he ‘should not’ – these are the two salient sides of Beneš's personality, or at least those two aspects of his personality which he decided to tell us about. Whilst one side of Beneš's personality acts instinctively, the other seems to follow external rules, and he is aware of both types of his behaviour. Beneš wants to live in total, ‘natural’ freedom of human individuals, yet he knows that he lives in a world which is ruled by constraints and in which expects that individuals conform to certain rules imposed on them by society. This is the way he perceives it. He fights against the imposed rules – as a human being, as a man and, perhaps even more, as an employee of an advertisement agency and as a journalist who is in everyday contact with poster-like images of ‘ideal beauty’ and with the glossy magazine ‘propaganda’ demanding that he should have a perfect body and a perfect lifestyle.⁴⁴ Describing himself in a negative manner is perhaps his natural reaction to the world of proposed images and norms.

Beneš is a man in his middle years who sees himself as a person without any particular physical sex appeal for women. It is important to stress that this is his own entirely subjective view because, as we will see, women do not necessarily seem to care that his body is imperfect, they sleep with him anyway. Furthermore, his friends and other people seem to like his company too. No matter how rude he might sometimes be to them (or he thinks he is), his company is often sought out.

The fact that Beneš ‘presents himself’ as an unattractive man can be interpreted in two ways: as a pose he assumes in order to excuse his own inability to look ‘better’ (‘I am what I am and I cannot change it’ – due to his lack of confidence or laziness) or a pose he assumes in order to express a carefree attitude towards the shape of his own body and the shape of things in general (‘I am what I want to be so leave me alone’) whilst he thinks something else. Therefore, even on the level of what he feels and thinks, there are two contradicting powers that contribute to the shaping of Beneš’s life: his instinctive reactions and the impact of social rules. Beneš is playing with both of them. He listens to his instincts and suppresses them. He adapts to the social rules and rejects them.

These two factors also influence the attitude the narrator employs during his encounters with other people. He is angry with his friend who messed up his books but, at the same time, he admits that this attitude might be selfish and unfair. People around him comment on the conflict which is present in his behaviour. The Danish Arab, Husta, with whom Beneš conducts the dialogue on loneliness quoted above, points out to him that, when he is alone, he is not ‘capable of being happy’. Husta warns him that loneliness, which he perhaps ‘instinctively’ seeks, does not seem to have a positive impact on his personality. In Husta’s view, Beneš ‘should not’ be alone.

Where does this character’s split personality come from? What are the causes of his indecisiveness that leaves him always wandering between two opposite attitudes? Is it his lack of confidence that makes him question all he sees or does? (But he does see and do things.) Is it his lack of interest in other people's views? (But he does listen to other people.) Is he afraid to confront his own desires? (But he does confront them.) Is he disgusted by the prevailing social norms? (But he does participate in social life.) To answer all these questions and relate the answers to the reality the narrative constructs, we need to learn more about Beneš's world now.

1.3 Jan Beneš & Emil Hakl

'In some cases, when the voice is strong or interesting enough, it may be that the narrator [him]self, rather than the story, is the centre of interest', says Abbott in his introduction to the theory of the narrative (Abbott 2002: 65-66). This seems to be also the case in Hakl's work. Konec světa is a story of one man and his perception of reality. It is this man's voice that stands in the centre of the narrative and shapes all that comes into his mind and that comes out of it into a story of the world. That story is called Jan Beneš (or Honza Beneš in a variation of the name). In this sense, the first question is who this Jan Beneš is.

Beneš is the main character of Hakl's work. He is the narrating 'I' of the text. From the external sources, we know that Jan Beneš is also the real name of the person who acts behind the mask of the pen-name, Emil Hakl, the undersigned author of the text. Jan Beneš-the character and the narrating 'I' of the text is approximately forty years old at the time when the story takes place; Jan Beneš, the writer of the text, was born in 1958. Jan Beneš, the character, lives in Prague; Jan Beneš, the writer, also does. Jan Beneš, the character and the writer, went through similar life and work experience. Both of them also write.⁴⁵

All these things suggest that Konec světa is inspired by Hakl's own life or, at least, that the writer 'uses' real people, real places and events to create a fictive 'real' which is presented in the book. He uses his perception of real people (e. g. Jan Beneš), real places (e. g. Prague, the Žižkov and the Letná quarters) and real events to construct the fictive reality of his book. He uses his perception of the self in order to construct the character and the main narrator, Jan Beneš. Finally, he uses his perception of some features of his own self in order to construct the whole character of Jan Beneš. Nevertheless, how close to the real world Hakl's fictive reality is and how much it reflects just the sheer joy of the writer's playful imagination that is the subject of the reader's construction. And this depends on the reader's knowledge of the 'real' and his ability to see through the signs the 'real' gives.

In general terms, Emil Hakl (alas Jan Beneš), the writer, no matter how convincing he may be, is only a vehicle through whom the message is channelled and passed to its audience. '[I]t is not man as conscious subject who thinks, acts or speaks, but the linguistic unconscious that determines his every thought, action and utterance' (Burke 1992: 13). It is not a reality that Hakl imposes on us that we read about in his texts. It is reality itself that 'uses' Hakl as a means of communication between the outside world and us. Furthermore, it is not the writer who gives the text its meaning but the reader who does it in the process of his or her reading. '[The reader] is simply that someone who holds together in a single field all the traces by which the written text is constituted' (Ibid: 27). The author reappears afterwards, 'as a desire of the reader's, a spectre spirited back into existence by the critic himself' (Ibid: 30). If Burke is right, it is not Hakl's subjective and conscious self that creates the text. It is the linguistic unconscious that determines the content of his writing. The writer chooses the form in which the content will be passed to the readers. However, only the readers can give this content (and form) its meaning.

When I, as a reader, stated that the text of Konec světa was inspired by Jan Beneš's own life, I was referring to the result of my reading experience of Hakl's books and to my own knowledge (and interpretation) of the world. From my own experience, I knew that certain places existed, that certain events happened and certain people lived. But there were also other sources such as, for example, the articles and the interviews published in various periodicals that made me consider the autobiographical inspiration (not autobiography) of Hakl's work.⁴⁶ It was from these articles and interviews I learnt about the writer's perception of his own life and discovered certain similarities between the story of Konec světa and the story of Hakl's (or Beneš's) life. This information can sometimes be gleaned also from some of the works of Hakl's literary friends. See, for instance, a text written by Václav Kahuda: Technologie dubnového večera (The Technology of an April Evening, 2000). In this work by Kahuda, Jan Beneš is one of the two main characters and here he also carries certain attributes which connect him with both the narrator and the writer of Hakl's text.

In order to examine Hakl's construction of reality, we need to analyze the identity of Jan Beneš, the character, because he is the main protagonist and the narrating 'I' of Hakl's texts and because it is his story that he shares with us, the readers. In order to understand his identity, we need to consider all the information available to us, no matter whether it has come from the text only or also from the external world (see the above debate on the autobiographical inspiration of Hakl's fiction). Only a combination of both can give us the desired result.

2. 'I' in union with the world and in conflict with it (in relation to society)

2.1 'I' in communication with others

When Beneš talks about himself, it is often the result of his communication with the people around him; with his friends, with his colleagues, with women or simply with random people whom he meets on the streets of Prague or in a pub. How Beneš presents himself varies. It depends on the situation in which he finds himself at the time and on the people he encounters. When he is with his closest friend, he says:

‘...it was indescribably pleasant to enjoy a beer with Pavlik and drink it with him in silence.’
[‘...bylo nepopsatelně příjemné jít s Pavlikem na pivo a mlčet.’] (KS: 5)

However, when talking about his interaction with strangers, he describes himself with irony:

‘I was rather good at impressing strangers with cheap tricks. It was one of the things I’ve always been best at.’
[‘Dojímat cizí lidi lacinými triky, to mi šlo odjakživa ze všeho nejlíp.’] (KS: 40) and produces personal statements bordering on the verge of bitterness:

‘...yes, there have always been loonies around me; I have always attracted them though longed to be in the company of sensible, intelligent, well-read people with whom it would be possible to analyse serious, preferably philosophical, topics for hours. (...) I longed to be in the company of sensible, intelligent people but when I met them, they bored me and pissed me off so much that I always instinctively detached myself from them even before I managed to notice them.’
[‘...ano, magorů jsem kolem sebe měl vždycky dost; přitahoval jsem je, zatímco jsem toužil po rozumných, inteligentních, sečtělých lidech, se kterými by bylo možno hodiny a hodiny rozebírat vážná, pokud možno filozofická témata. (...) Toužil jsem po rozumných, inteligentních lidech, ale když jsem je potkal, nudili mě a sráli tak a natolik, že jsem se pokaždé instinktivně odpoutal dřív, než jsem si jich vůbec stačil všimnout.’] (KS: 61)

These three examples represent three different assessments Beneš gives himself after being ‘confronted’ with other people. The meeting with Pavlik is unambiguously a positive experience. The statement refers to Beneš’s intimate friendship that does not need words or any other form of communication. It is enough only to ‘drink’ ‘in silence’ and ‘be’. On the other hand, his random encounters with strangers make him talk, act and pretend. These encounters make him become a stranger to himself. They make him behave in a different manner – as a person who impresses other people ‘with cheap tricks’ rather than behaving naturally. They make him act against his own natural self, which desires an unpretentious life in peace and quiet and abhors pretence. But Jan Beneš finds it difficult to decide whether to be true to himself or to play-act in front of other people. He suffers from indecision and oscillates between one and the other position.

Beneš’s personality is defined by indecisive chaos – at least the personality he perceives within himself when he speaks about his attitude towards intelligent people and towards ‘loonies’. In his own words, intelligent people attract him but he cannot stand them and so he keeps escaping to the ‘loonies’. The ‘loonies’ always welcome him, but he does not want to be with them either. He is afraid of becoming ‘a loony’ himself and so he longs for the company of intelligent people. His conscious mind tells him to lead a responsible life with an aim. His unconscious mind drags him away from the responsibility for his own actions to the safety and inactivity of his own self. Being in the company of sensible and intelligent people (but ‘strangers’) means to him he has ‘to pretend’. Being with ‘loonies’ (but also his friends) gives the luxury that he can just ‘exist’. Beneš does not say that all strangers are sensible and intelligent people. What he says is that sensible and intelligent people are strangers to him. He does not imply that friends are ‘loonies’, but that ‘loonies’ are good friends. He is lost in between these two worlds.

Konec světa is a life story of one character of Jan Beneš. It tells us how he sees the world. The ‘world’ consists of people and places he encounters at a particular time. It encompasses all that exists as a result of activity around the central figure of Jan Beneš. The following chapter is about Beneš’s male friends. Women play a different role in the narrator’s life and, therefore, I will discuss them separately.

2.2 ‘I’ amongst (male) friends and strangers

There are many men who flit through Beneš’s personal life but only a few of them stay in his mind for any length of time. These are the only ones we know by name, often in a shortened form or as a nickname. So we learn, for example, about Pavlik, with whom he likes to share a quiet beer in the local bar (‘Jedno odpoledne’: KS), about Jirka Vokurka, a parody representation of a member of what was once an underground⁴⁷ generation, who now barely survives in capitalist society ('Zlaté časy': KS); about Fáfa, Jan Beneš's pub friend, whom some people see as a well-respected 'bohemian', others as a hopeless alcoholic ('Zlaté časy', 'Zlaté časy, díl 2': KS); about Láďa, whom the reader first encounters on the way across India where Láďa travels in order to recover from what he saw as his wife's infidelity ('Ládovo poslední tango', 'Bouřka': KS); about Zdeněk, Beneš's former colleague from the Prague Waterworks and a punk with black sunglasses who says he knows how to steal cars ('Druhá třetina': KS); and about Kratochvil, with whom Beneš takes a walk up a hill (Ibid.). Names are also given to the three foreigners who appear in Beneš's life for only a short time but make a strong impression on him: Husta (an Arab from Denmark), the drug dealer ('První cizinci v Praze': KS); the American, Džouzef, a former soldier who had been fired from the army for some unspecified shady dealings (Ibid.); and the German, Georg, 'Hollywood filmmaker', whom Beneš's friend, Láďa, had met in India and later introduced to others ('Ládovo poslední tango', 'Bouřka': KS).

Nearly all these characters have one significant thing in common: they are what Beneš would see as 'loonies'. It is their never-ending struggle for survival in this world which is hostile and indifferent to them so that it makes them act as 'loonies'. What is attractive to Beneš is how these characters behave and what they do in order to survive the present era which threatens to overwhelm them. Beneš empathizes with their 'lunacy' or 'lunatic otherness' which he sees as nothing more and nothing less than a search for a stable place within the world and society – he is searching for the same things. He observes their behaviours and, on the ground of what he sees, he tries to understand them and his life amongst them.

Beneš's 'loonies' are described as sad caricatures of people who lost their confident and active selves some time in the past. The present seems to be too complicated for them and so they struggle. While struggling, they behave passively or look for ways to escape. They ⁴⁷ 'Underground' is a term used to identify culture outside the mainstream. 'Underground is a spiritual position of those intellectuals and artists who see themselves as being critical towards the world in which they live. [U]nderground is the activity of those artists and intellectuals whose work is unacceptable for the establishment; those artists and intellectuals who are not passive in their activity and their attitudes but who create such work as attempts to destroy the establishment.' ['Underground je duchovní pozice intelektuálů a umělců, kteří se vědomě kriticky vymezují vůči světu, ve kterém žijí. [U]nderground je aktivita umělců a intelektuálů, jejichž dílo je nepřijatelné pro establishment, a kteří v této nepřijatelnosti nejsou trpní a pasivní, ale snaží se svým dílem a svým postojem o destrukci establishmentu.'] JIROUS, Martin (2008): "Zpráva o třetím českém hudebním obrození" in Šulc, Jan: Pravdivý příběh Plastic People. spend time in pubs; they drink alcohol, use drugs or steal. They preoccupy themselves with their own memories and constantly talk about them. They hide behind their ‘lunacy’ and their own spoken and unspoken monologues; they keep escaping to dreams; some of them run away to a different country or they just wander about. Beneš’s ‘loonies’ or ‘tiring cranks’, as he also calls them, are outsiders standing on the periphery of society which they do not understand or do not want to accept. As a result, they do things (if they act at all) that are seen by the ‘orderly’ side of Beneš’s personality as sad and crazy (one of the characters dances with an umbrella in the middle of the road in the middle of busy traffic, another one sleeps in a polythene bag). The ‘disorderly’ side of Beneš’s character prefers these ‘tiring cranks’ to individuals who conform to the system and pragmatically use its resources for their own profit and ‘who are only interested in whether the other person agrees with them at the given moment’ [‘ty, které zajímá jen a jen to, jestli s nimi ten druhý v dané chvíli souhlasí’] (Ibid: 148).

Beneš’s interest in ‘loonies’ manifests itself on two parallel levels: on the level of the narrating self and on the level of the acting self. The narrating Jan Beneš enjoys the rich tapestry of ‘loonies’ because they give him stories – life-like and tangible stories. He does not find ‘orderly’ and pragmatic people interesting and worthy of mention. He claims they bore him. But he cannot deny that he needs them as much as he needs those ‘loonies and tiring cranks’. Without either of them, he claims, his story would not be complete.

The acting Jan Beneš cares for the company of the ‘loonies and tiring cranks’ but the main reason for this lies in his emotional world. Such individuals attract him but they also irritate him. Their presence calms him down but their unpretentious and unpredictable behaviour scares him. This is due to one thing: Beneš feels that he may be one of them. Or perhaps only one side of his personality feels this. The other side of his personality is struggling to make sure that he is not like them. It is trying to persuade him to integrate within ‘orderly’ and pragmatic society. Here, the same applies: the acting Jan Beneš needs both companies. He cannot be with only the ‘loonies’ because their lack of stability tires him. He cannot be with only the ‘orderly people’ because their stability bores him. Beneš’s position within these two worlds can be demonstrated by discussing three characters of Konec světa: Lád’a, Fáfa and Jan Beneš.

2.3 Lád’a, Fáfa and Jan Beneš

Not all of Jan Beneš’s friends and acquaintances are drawn as round characters. Only a few of them were given a chance to present their world to the reader and to show us various layers of their complicated personalities as they clash with the reality they live in. We often learn about them from the conversations they have with Beneš over a pint of beer or elsewhere, or from Beneš's recollection of the past.

Some characters that participate in the creation of the narrative of Konec světa come from Beneš's past, some from his present. The former have been in Beneš's life since his youth or early adulthood. The latter turn up in Beneš's life all of sudden, put it out of order and then leave. Only a few characters, mostly people from his past, have been able to get close to Beneš's heart.

There are individuals who appear in the narrative on more than one occasion, others just once. Those characters who appear more frequently are again mostly people Beneš knows from his past. Those who flit through the story only once are usually from his present. This distinction is, however, not straightforward. 'Once' does not necessarily mean that they are unimportant. Some characters appear once but, according to the tone Beneš applies when talking about them, we recognize their importance in his life. This happens, for instance, in the case of Kratochvíl, with whom Beneš takes a walk in the Czech countryside ('Druhá třetina': KS). Kratochvíl's importance is again related to his past and to his understanding of security and of peace of mind.

There are two characters Beneš mentions several times: Láďa, who also becomes the narrating character of one story included in Konec světa – 'Láďovo poslední tango', and Fáfa ('Zlaté časy', 'Zlaté časy, díl 2': KS). Beneš finds it interesting and important to observe their personalities, their behaviour in certain situations and their personal struggles for a place within the social environment and so he comments on it. We meet both characters when everything in their lives seems to be breaking down and they have to decide what to do in order to survive. Both of them make an effort but each of them ends up with a completely different personal outcome: Láďa, returning from a lonely journey to India, chooses to lead an orderly or perhaps a semi-orderly life. He acquires a family and a house with a garden for growing vegetables and secretly also marihuana plants. Fáfa, losing his chance for an orderly life after leaving his girlfriend, ends up drinking enormous amounts of alcohol and crying over his loss.

Láďa, Fáfa and Jan Beneš are old friends. We do not know much about their friendship but what we learn from Beneš is that the three men do have something that connects them on a personal level. They know each other from the past, they come from the same generation of people born some time in the 1950s and they all find it difficult to cope with the present. They all struggle and, while doing so, they do things or fall into things that confuse and surprise them. In the end, it is only Láďa who succeeds in gaining a certain stability and inner peace. His personal reconciliation does not come at once, though. It is a process that starts with Láďa's personal breakdown, continues in a small Indian village where he travels to calm his burning emotions, and ends in a rediscovery of his forgotten self in the city of Prague and in the Czech countryside:

‘The train now travelled very slowly. The hollowed-out chassis chortled noisily. A tiny, child-sized quarter of Libeň was visible from the window. (...) Everything was somehow colourless, faded, yet so familiar... He realized that from now he would have to live here.’

Fáfa's life is fully governed by the spirit of freedom. He constantly travels around, wastes money excessively but is able to survive without it. He drinks and socializes with people. He lives from day to day in a carefree manner. He worries about nothing, especially not about the future:

‘He lived like on a conveyor belt. He felt the need constantly to change his personal circumstances, because he was never able to look at where he was and how he was getting to a particular place for any length of time. He used to be away for weeks. Then he always returned and, with total carelessness, made debts which he could not repay.’

[‘Žil jako na běžícím pásu. Potřeboval pořád měnit okolnosti svého života, protože se nikdy nevydržel dlouho dívat na to, kde zrovna je a jak se tam má. Býval pryč celé týdny. Potom se vracel a s ukrutnou bezstarostností dělal dluhy, které nemohl splatit.’] (KS: 138)

In his life, everything seems to be going fine, up and down, but still all right. But then he falls in love with a girl and he loses her. He sacrifices his personal freedom for love and for a sudden vision of stable life and, when his relationship, i.e. his dream of something ‘orderly and normal’, disintegrates – partly due to his lack of self-confidence and partly due to his misbehaviour –, he breaks down. Instead of a free man who knew how to enjoy life, Beneš suddenly sees a broken individual who has given up on his life and who has succumbed to alcohol.

The third person in this group is Jan Beneš. If, from the point of view of conventional wisdom, Láďa is a social success and Fáfa a failure, then Beneš's position would be somewhere in between – never precisely in the middle but as a point constantly moving from one place to another. He is successful when he manages to get a job, when he finds a woman and when he enjoys his one-off sexual encounters, possibly also when he writes his own literary texts. He feels he is a failure when he loses all this. In between, he contemplates his life in relation to the decisions he has made or he is thinking of making and in relation to the people around.

Beneš talks about both of these friends and spends time with them because he searches for his own identity in them. He compares himself to them. Lád'a's story attracts him because it brings some kind of solution and clarity to the man's chaotic existence. Perhaps it is not a very brave solution, for it means that Lád'a is forced to accept the ways of the establishment and to adjust to them, but it is a solution for a person who does not want to live in turmoil. Fáfa, on the other hand, becomes the subject of Beneš's interest because he is an embodied representation of unsettled human nature, unexpected behaviour, sadness and apathy into which people fall after losing their place next to someone they love.

All these three individuals, Lád'a, Fáfa and Jan Beneš, have grown up in the same environment but their contemporary existence now differs greatly: Lád'a's lifestyle is now close to the lifestyle of the 'orderly' world; Fáfa is vegetating on the margins of society; and the indecisive Beneš struggles somewhere in between. His sympathy lies with those individuals who defy society as well as with those who conform to it. He himself is everywhere and nowhere.

Lád'a's and Fáfa's behaviour represents two different aspects of how Beneš tries to cope with the current 'real'. But these two men are not the only individuals in Konec světa who have been exposed to a desperate situation and whom Jan Beneš confronts. There are many other characters going through much personal turmoil and struggling to find a way of organizing their lives. There is a group of foreigners who play quite an important role in one of the stages of Beneš's life, though their influence does not last for long (see below). They come and they leave. They bring stories, expensive cars, alcohol and drugs and take away Beneš's peace and his Czech girlfriends. Still, he sympathises with them: he observes them, talks to them and listens to them; he tolerates them but only for the time being. As soon as they disappear, he forgets them. The foreigners function within Beneš's present. He knows nothing about their past. Their stories, if any, are always connected to the present and are always part of the world in chaos. Unlike the 'loonies', the foreigners do not make a deep impact on Beneš's life but he cannot deny their influence on him and their overwhelming presence he feels when he is around them.

There seems to be a major difference in Beneš's mind between who is a friend and who just a passer-by. The way Beneš talks about certain people gives the impression that he values friendship. For instance, there is friendship between Jan Beneš and Fáfa, although it is often developed in pubs and is accompanied with sudden flashes of Beneš's anger; between Jan Beneš and Pavlik, because the friendship does not need any words to communicate (they drink a beer in silence together); or between Jan Beneš and a woman named Renata who, as Beneš says, still belongs to the 'slowly disintegrating company of people from my younger days' ['zvolna se rozpadající party mladších let'] (KS: 45). It is the shared past and the similar life experience that bring Jan Beneš, Fáfa, Lád'a, Kratochvil and Renata together. The past is something that connects them; a bond that has developed over the years spent in the same social and political environment. It does not matter if Lád'a later joins the 'orderly' world and Fáfa rebels against it. What connects them all is that they share the same past. And 'sharing' means 'trust' in Beneš's understanding of the world. 'Trust' is given by him to those who 'share' the same experience of the past with him.

Newcomers and youngsters belong to Beneš's present world. But the present world, as he keeps pointing out, is nothing more than wandering between 'moving', 'becoming' and 'staying'. The past seems to be the only thing that is well-known to him and therefore safe. The present is unknown and therefore unsafe. Lád'a, Fáfa and Petr Kratochvil come from Beneš's past. Beneš knows what to expect from them and so he feels safe in their company, even though it sometimes means that he feels as if he is a 'waster'. Newcomers as well as young people bring ideas, views and things that are inspiring, but too new and too unknown. Still, it would not be true to say that Beneš despises them. On the contrary, he sympathises with them as much as he sympathises with people locked in a personal struggle and in the same way that he sympathizes with 'loonies'. However, he never trusts the newcomers because he does not feel a real friendship. This belongs to those who are part of his past; those who did not give up on him as he did not give up on them. His friends might be wasters who spend their days drinking, but still he feels more comfortable and safe among them because he knows them, because nothing about them can surprise him. His friends represent stability in his chaotic world. Paradoxically, it is a stability of people who themselves feel unstable and struggling.

The notion of 'sharing the past' is important in Beneš's approach to the people around him. The present is confusing. How his past and present experiences interact depends on the time he spends in the contemplation of both and on the amount of space he is willing to give them.

2.4 Jan Beneš and his perception of ‘time’

During one of his numerous encounters, Jan Beneš turns his attention to the concept of reality and states:

„... yep! Because reality is definitely only what one wants to see as reality at that time, and it is only what one does and doesn't like...!“
 [„...jo! Protože realita je definitivně jen a jenom to, co člověk v tu chvíli jako realitu chce vnímat, zas jenom to, co má a nemá rád...!“] (KS: 218)

What, then, is the reality he has in mind?

We have already noted that the individual stories of Konec světa take place in the period that corresponds with 1980s-1990s, which is also the time when Hakl's (Beneš's) own personal history unrolls. We have also pointed out the similarities between the story of Konec světa and the story of Hakl's (Beneš's) life. Autobiographical inspiration of Hakl's work has then been suggested. But it is not only the story of Konec světa that carries the traces of Hakl's personal life. It is also the whole structure of this prose that is built in the line of the autobiographical style/genre.

The time in which individual narratives of Konec světa are told is, similarly to the autobiographical style of writing, linear (successive), as it follows the line of Beneš's life, but it is also cyclic (retrospective) as it follows his narration (memories), and diverse, as it follows his perception of other people's stories. The 'live' story of Beneš's world flows but it is interrupted with quite a few excursions to his own past, to his dreams, to his thoughts and to the stories of the other characters, which the narrating Beneš re-tells in his own way (sometimes he is even hidden behind the voice of another character). It is exactly thanks to these interruptions from the past and their position in the present that we have a chance to examine Beneš's perception of the events and thoughts, and to ascertain which memories have been selected by him for inclusion in his literary text and why and which of them have been intentionally or incidentally blanked out.

The temporal linearity of each single story, of each single volume and of the whole literary output by Hakl, is affected by the order in which Beneš retells his experiences and the experiences of others. However, the flow of Hakl's texts is also influenced by the duration of the narrated story and by the speed with which the narrating Beneš describes various events and thoughts that have happened in the course of the narrative. According to Prince, '[t]he speed of a narrative is equal to the relationship between the duration of the narrated – the (approximate) time the events recounted go on or are thought to go on – and the length of the narrative (in words, lines, or pages for example).’ But also: ‘[t]he speed of a narrative varies considerably and it is [the] narration which helps to give the narrative a certain rhythm’ (Prince 1982: 55-56). We have already noted that the stories included in the volume of Konec světa are told by the narrating character, Jan Beneš, and this character also fully controls the speed of the narrative. Where his voice focuses on a particular action which has just happened, there the time of the event corresponds to the time of its narration. The event has only been delayed by the fact of its retelling. A direct mode of discourse, accompanied by the narrating character’s indirect speech is used here: ‘Pavlik yawned: “Let’s have a drink somewhere...”’ [‘Pavlik zívnuł: „Tak pudem někam na pivo...”’] (KS: 5); or not (in dialogues), or the text consists of a sequence of closely connected events: ‘When the door slammed shut, I lay down on my sofa (...)’ [‘Když zaklaply dveře, lehnul jsem si na kanape (...)’] (KS: 25). These are the devices that give Hakl’s text the characteristics of a scene (Prince 1982: 55-56). Where Beneš’s voice concentrates on the events that happened some time in the past, the time during which these events occurred and the time of their retelling varies. Such events are often summarized:

‘These were bright and erratic times. It did not occur to anyone at that time that they would end. Summer gently broke and autumn was approaching.’

stretched:

[‘Napadlo mě, že bych s ohledem na dívčí část obecnstva mohl alespoň trochu zatáhnout břicho, ale hned jsem se na to vykašlal. Byl to jeden z momentů, kdy nestojí za to nic předstírat.’] (KS: 46-47)

or elliptic:

‘They took the meat out, put it on the table together with a French roll to go with it. I brought mustard. They applauded me. After the meal, they lit cigarettes and smoked.’
[‘Vytáhli maso, donesli na stůl, k tomu byla veka. Přinesl jsem hořčici. Zatleskali mi. Po jídle si zapálili.’] (KS: 24)

Where Beneš concentrates on one given moment in the present or in the past, the time of the event slows down or freezes completely; the dynamic flow changes to the static, the active to the passive and the action to the scene. The static scene can have the shape of a momentary impression (dynamic within, but static when viewed from the outside):

‘Words we did not want to be connected with flew aimlessly all around us. The rain became heavier.’

[‘Všude kolem nás bloudila slova, se kterými jsme nechtěli mít nic společného. Děšť zesílil.’] (KS: 47) or of a description of people, things or places:

‘Pavlik had huge, round, thoughtful eyes I had never seen on him before.’

[‘Pavlik měl velké, kulaté, pozorné oči, které jsem u něj ještě nikdy neviděl.’] (KS: 9)

Finally, where the narration becomes the narration of a thought, time separates and, instead of one line, it forms two different lines that run across each other – the first one, horizontal, is ruled by the real order of events (linear and cyclic; slow, normal and fast), the second one, vertical, follows the depths of a single human self:

‘What a beast you are, I told myself. Books are closer to you than a human being, I told myself. Than a friend. But it is not the books I am concerned about, I tried to calm myself down, what matters is my living space...’

[‘Co seš to za hovado, říkal jsem si. Knihy jsou ti bližší než člověk, říkal jsem si. Než kamarád. Jenomže o knihy nejde, uklidňoval jsem se, jde o prostor k životu...’] (KS: 62-63)

Further in the line, Prince adds: ‘the speed at which the narrated unfolds clearly has implications for our processing and evaluating that narrated and for our response to the narrative as a whole’ (Ibid: 59). Both the order and the speed at which the narrating Beneš introduces his story are subjective. This fully conforms to Beneš’s subjective perception of the world and his intention to communicate it to his readers. Beneš is the one who decides what events and thoughts will be involved in the story he narrates, to what extent they will be modified (in time) and how much space they will take up in the story. By this he also influences our perception of his world.

Prince also says: ‘the more fore-grounded that event is the more importance it takes. Similarly, the more frequently an event is described, the more significant it presumably is’ (Ibid). However, as he also points out, it is true that this way of writing ‘allows the writer to trick us: an event that was barely described proves to be essential; another that was described at length proves to be insignificant' (Ibid.). In one of the chapters above we have discussed this ambiguity in relation to 'once' and to 'on more than one occasion'. This has been done in relation to the various encounters which the narrator of Konec světa has with different people. Nevertheless, these contradictions can be found on all the levels of Haki's text.

The most frequent motif in the stories of Konec světa is the permanent presence of Beneš's narrating voice, in all the stories; Jan Beneš – the acting and the speaking 'I' – is omnipresent. He is the entity that lies behind each narrative and therefore his life is an 'event' which is discussed in considerable depth and in considerable detail. However, a large field occupied by other people and other events lies around this centralizing 'I'. This field always shrinks and expands – in both the horizontal (frequency in characters' appearance, frequency in events and scenes) and the vertical (depth/details) direction.

The existence of the narrating character, Jan Beneš, is one thing. All that shapes him and all that comes from him is another. What shapes him is society that surrounds him; the society that exists and develops under certain conditions, at a certain time, in a certain place, in a certain language and within a certain political and cultural background. What emerges from him is his living, observant and critical experience of all that. What we perceive is the outcome of his willingness to share.

2.5 The content: the revealed and the suspended information

It is not only the omnipresent existence of the character Jan Beneš (or Honza) which brings all the stories presented in the narratives of Konec světa together. What also matters here is how the individual narratives are both told and integrated within the structure of the whole volume and within the reality which they (re)present.

From the perspective of genre distinction, Konec světa consists of ten individual stories. Some of these stories appear as an individual unit, others are divided into several chapters. Each story has a name, every chapter is numbered. All together, however, they build the integrated volume of Konec světa; the volume which seems to be balancing on the verge between a novel and a collection of short stories. The linking element is Jan Beneš and his life.

Each narrative of Konec světa is different but, at the same time, similar to all the others. Each narrative works with a specific situation or event, yet the main characteristics of the whole book, including Jan Beneš, the places and the memories, stay the same throughout the volume.

Time has a major impact on the way each story is narrated and perceived. The narrator's focus keeps shifting our attention from one person, one situation and one scene to another and back. The overall attitude stays the same: it is 'life according to Jan Beneš'. To see how this principle works throughout the whole volume of Konec světa, we have to look at the summaries of all the storylines included in the texts of this volume:

'Jedno odpoledne' ('One afternoon') opens the book with Beneš's impression of the momentary atmosphere that surrounds him and his friend Pavlik on the walk down the streets of Prague and on their visit to one of the local pubs where they both order a beer and observe what the usual drunkards do and say. 'První cizinci v Praze' ('The First Foreigners in Prague') plays with the idea of the suddenly blossoming tourist trade and its dual effect on the Prague locals and especially on Beneš himself, his own life and the life of Czech contemporary society. The main narrative is filled with various personal stories which Beneš's acquaintances told him or which he has himself observed and understood. 'Zlaté časy' ('Golden Times') contemplates friendship; 'Konec světa' ('The End of the World') is an account of sexual encounters between Jan Beneš and an ageing ballet-dancer. The sex act provokes an explosion of his thoughts about what might happen if the world comes to an end. 'Vzpomínka na Ozzyho' ('Remembering Ozzy') juxtaposes Beneš's work for the advertisement industry with the personal life of his alcoholic artist friend. 'Lád'ovo poslední tango' ('Lád'a's Last Tango') follows Beneš's friend Lád'a's journey through India; 'Zlaté časy, díl 2' ('Golden Times, part 2') continues Beneš's exposition on the nature of friendship, this time listening to the narrative of his friend, Fáfa; in 'Bouřka' ('The Storm'), Beneš meets Lád'a, his family, his German companion, George, from India and his girlfriend in a rather awkward situation which occurs during their meeting in Lád'a's house. 'Vrah' ('The Murderer') is based on one of the conversations overheard in a pub. Finally, 'Druhá třetina' ('The Second Third'), with the subtitle 'rychlrozpuštný román' ('an instantly soluble novel'), mixes all the above themes. We learn that Beneš found a job and then lost it. We learn about his attitude to friendship, love and sexual experience with various women; we learn about his thoughts regarding his solitude. We learn what he thinks about TV programmes, about his trips abroad, about memories and several of his activities, even addictions.

One way is to look at the stories of Konec světa in sequence; the other is to consider the content of the volume from the perspective of time, working closely with the narrator's focus on particular characters, events and objects:

In 'Zlaté časy' ('Golden Times'), we learn about the existence of Beneš's friend, Fáfa, who likes playing the guitar. We meet this character again in 'Zlaté časy, díl 2' ('Golden Times, part 2'), this time as a person who has lost his girlfriend and now, sitting in the pub with Beneš, talking about it with great regret. 'Lád'ovo poslední tango' ('Lád'a's Last Tango') is written in the style of a personal diary of a traveller. Lád'a recounts the experience of his journey through India where he decided to go after his girlfriend had left him. Later on, we meet Lád'a and his German friend, Georg, whose acquaintance he made in India, in 'Bouřka' ('The Storm'), a story which describes their subsequent encounter at Lád'a's place. Here the narrator, speaking to us through the mouth of Jan Beneš, an acquaintance of both men, gives us a brief outline of what happened with them and their lifestyles during the period between their Indian journey and this particular meeting. In 'První cizinci v Praze' ('The First Foreigners in Prague'), Beneš describes his feelings about foreigners coming to Czechoslovakia after its opening to Western Europe. He talks about his wild experiences with Danish, French, English and American people as he had a chance to meet them while being in a relationship with his girlfriend, Řípa, and then with Renata. Renata is remembered also in the last story, 'Druhá Třetina' ('The Second Third') as his then girlfriend. In several other texts, we learn about Jan Beneš's work in the advertising industry and about his personal interest in aeroplanes, pub talk, beer drinking and films.

As we may see, there are certain characters (Fáfa, Lád'a, Renata), certain motifs (pub talks, beer, aeroplanes, dreams, encounters, advertisement, Prague) and themes ('I with/against 'them', friendship, sexual relationship, periphery and mainstream, present and past) that keep appearing and disappearing throughout the volume. Altogether, they create the master plot of Konec světa. The order of the narration, Beneš's focus on certain people, places and moments and Beneš's omnipresence in all individual narratives of Konec světa are the important factors of the narrative discourse that shapes this master plot.

We have already suggested that the master plot of Konec světa is 'life according to Jan Beneš'. We have also noted that, since it is the 'life' of Jan Beneš, it moves forward as it follows Jan Beneš's experience of the real. Since it is the life 'according to' Jan Beneš, it is ruled by the subjective powers of the narrating self. It is the narrator talking through the character of Jan Beneš who decides whether the order of the story follows the ordinary flow of time or whether it takes us back to his own memories or to memories of others; whether the story is presented at a pace that corresponds with what we perceive as the real pace of the event or whether it is slowed down or made faster; whether the story is told at all and just left to the reader's own imagination.

What is presented in Konec světa are Beneš's encounters with friends and with 'loonies', his sexual encounters with various women, his walks through the city of Prague, his visits to Prague local pubs, his observations of other people's behaviour, his dreams and his contemplations of the world and human existence in it. Other things have been left out or barely mentioned. For example, we know only a little about Beneš's personal background in the past. We know that he was married, that he worked for Prague Waterworks, that he befriended Kratochvíl, Láďa and Fáfa and that he was a regular visitor of certain places and pubs. The last two bits of information seem to hold a significant importance in Beneš's life. Hence, he gives us the history of these events and places and their present picture on several occasions and in more detail. The first two pieces of information mentioned here appear in the story only as brief remarks lying outside Beneš's main focus on events and objects. Some information is omitted completely. For instance, we know nothing about Beneš's birth, his family and his childhood.

There is the revealed part of the text and there is the part which is hidden. In order to understand Beneš's choice to speak about one thing and not about another, we need to examine both the information he has given us and the information he has decided to leave out, and this has to be done within the context of the whole narrative of Konec světa.

There is no way of ascertaining the motives of the narrator's decision regarding what to put in and what to leave out, because the decision was made as a result of his conscious and unconscious thought processes or, more precisely, as a result of the author's conscious and unconscious thought processes. Nevertheless, there are still certain paths we may take in order to approach the narrative of Konec světa from the perspective of what is 'in the text' and what is 'outside the text' while respecting their suggested but hidden sense.

One approach expands on the passage from Prince's work quoted above: '[T]he more fore-grounded that event is, the more importance it takes' (Prince 1982: 59). According to this statement, what the narrator mentions and what he mentions more often and in greater detail than anything else may be the core information for our understanding of Beneš's image of life. Specifically, in Konec světa, it is 'friendship' (a representation of what Beneš sees as a social bond that lasts), 'Beneš's sympathy with 'loonies'' (a counterpart of what is 'orderly and normal', a representation of life in emotional turmoil), his 'sexual encounters' (a representation of the world of physical desires and needs), 'the city of Prague' (a representation of Beneš's home), 'pub talk' (a representation of the world of bustling narratives), ‘pub visits’ (a representation of Beneš’s need to socialize and share), ‘dreams’ (a form of escape from the real) and ‘contemplation of the contemporary world’ (critical reflections on the human existence within it). All these topics taken together make the core structure of the narrative of Konec světa. The other topics, which are barely mentioned, seem to be insignificant. Without these significant topics, the narrative would be radically different. Without the other insignificant topics, the narrative would remain basically unchanged.

Another approach to narrative argues the exact opposite of the first one. It points out that ‘an event that was barely described proves to be essential’ (Prince 1982: 59). In accordance with this statement, the information the narrator has concealed from us is essential for our interpretation of Beneš’s story. We have already noted that the narrating Beneš does not talk about Beneš’s family, about his childhood or about his married life. There are many different ways that this can be interpreted. The first approach would see the lack of Beneš’s past personal details in the text as ‘insignificant’ or ‘unimportant’ for the story the narrative seeks to tell. The second approach would play with various ideas and among them it would try to discover those which might be crucial to our understanding of the reality the narrative presents and those which might be just of a marginal character in the overall structure of the text. From this point of view, we would analyze the information in the following binary opposites of public (revealed) information and private (omitted) information, pleasant (revealed) information and unpleasant (omitted) information, interesting (revealed) information and boring (omitted) information and important (revealed) information and unimportant (omitted) information. Whilst ‘public’ information refers to Beneš’s adulthood, ‘private’ information is his childhood; whilst ‘pleasant’ information is his frequent sexual affairs, ‘unpleasant’ information is his failure in the role of husband; whilst ‘interesting’ information is the life of ‘loonies’, ‘boring’ information is the life of mainstream society; and ‘important’ information is his pub friends, ‘unimportant’ information is his working environment. This varies in Hakl’s other works (see later).

Considering both approaches in relation to our understanding of Hakl’s narrative, it can be seen that they both have a significant place as an instrument for analyzing the structure of the text. The revealed information is core to our overview of Beneš’s world, the revealed and the suspended information taken together is core to our interpretation of Beneš’s reactions and his behaviour in a certain place and at a certain time. In this sense, if we want to find out why Beneš talks about his ‘loony’ friends in such vivid colours, we also need to find out why he finds his life within the ‘normal’ society uninteresting and almost not worth mentioning. The same will apply to all the other binary opposites.

2.6 The existence of the ‘known’ and the arrival of the new and the ‘unknown’

When we discussed Beneš’s attitude to friendship, we mentioned the names Lád’a, Fáf’a, Pavlik, Petr Kratochvíl and Renata. These were all the people whom Beneš would classify as the ‘slowly disintegrating company of people from my younger days’ [‘zvolna se rozpadající party mladších let’] (KS: 45), although he uses this expression only in the case of Renata. We can hardly say anything about the character of Pavlik and about the character of Petr, for the only time we meet them is during the peaceful walk they take with Beneš in the city and in the countryside. On the other hand, Lád’a, Fáf’a and Renata are remembered on several occasions but always in connection with things like living (or trying to live) a relatively free life; drinking, smoking marihuana, socializing and talking. All of them have been trying to escape from their current lives and all of them have experienced failure. What is also significant for all these characters is that their escape always falls into the category of something ‘foreign’, or takes the shape of something ‘new’ and ‘young’. Lád’a travels to India to run away from his broken relationship but he fails to survive there. Renata travels to London to seek adventure and love but fails to adjust. Fáf’a falls in love with a wealthy East German girl but fails to adjust to a world of different morals.

‘The slowly disintegrating company of my younger days’ – the expression itself signifies that something that was familiar and complete is approaching its end and, instead, something new, foreign, different is coming. The feeling of the departure of the old and the arrival of the new is referred to repeatedly throughout the whole narrative; it touches on Beneš’s thoughts when thinking about his frequent encounters with women:

‘These were bright and erratic times. It did not occur to anyone at that time that they would end. Summer gently broke and autumn was approaching.’
[‘Byly to pestré, proměnlivé časy. Nikoho z nás ani nenapadlo, že by měly tehdy skončit. Léto se zlehka přelomilo a začal se blížit podzim.’] (KS: 20)

when attending a concert where a group of young French people perform; when throwing the leaving party for Renata:

‘Even those of us who preferred describable life over unfruitful dreaming felt the weight of the recognition that something was changing during this very night. We could not only feel it but we could almost see it. We found ourselves in a hollow. Something had finished and something had not yet started.’

[‘I na ty z nás, kteří dávali přednost popsateľnému životu před neplodným sněním, dolehlo poznání, že právě této noci se něco mění. Bylo to nejen cítit, bylo to skoro vidět. Nacházeli jsme se v dutině. Něco už skončilo a něco ještě nezačalo.’] or when lying in a ditch with his friend, drunk:

‘A new day was approaching. Future still wanted to uncover many incredible secrets for us. Somewhere behind the horizon, the digital era was slowly making its preparations. But we were lying in a ditch and in no way could we come to life.’

[‘Začínal nový den. Budoucnost nám chtěla odhalit ještě mnohá a neuvěřitelná tajemství. Někde za obzorem se už pomalounku chystala digitální éra. Jenomže my jsme leželi v příkopě a za žádnou cenu se nemohli probrat k životu.’] (KS: 149)

These examples show that Beneš’s attitude to the new, which could be anything – adulthood, new society, a new relationship – is ambiguous. Beneš is full of curiosity but he is sceptical too; he is also full of excitement and nostalgia. Adulthood brings a sexual interest in young women to Jan Beneš but this interest does not last because the gap between the expectations of enthusiastic and young people and the expectations of a sceptical and tired middle-aged man, as he often sees himself, seems to be too big to be overcome. The new political regime in Czechoslovakia after the 1989 fall of communism to which the narrative refers gives Beneš an opportunity to try things he would hardly be able to do under the old regime (to set up his own business, to travel to the West). Nevertheless, he is often unable to cope with the new moves of post-communist society and fails:

‘That summer I was a co-owner of one small firm in the Letná quarter. Business went from bad to worse... There were no customers. So the best of all was to sit in the garden of the Šlechtovka restaurant, to enjoy the late morning shade and drink beer, eat frankfurters with a double portion of mustard for lunch, and try not to disturb the scarcely visible summer phantoms which appeared in the corners of the crumbling summer house.’

[‘To léto jsem byl spoluvlastníkem jedné firmičky na Letné. Co se té firmy týká, šlo to od desíti k pěti... Kšefty se nehýbaly. A tak jsem ze všeho nejraději sedával na zahradě Šlechtovky, užíval si dopoledního stínu, pil desítku, obědval párky s dvojitou hořčicí a snažil se co nejmíň rušit řid’oucké letní fantomy, zjevující se v koutech rozpadajícího se letohrádku.’] (KS: 85)

In an attempt to adjust to the new, Jan Beneš and his friends set up their own business together, but he struggles to sustain it and so he leaves. He tries to find the best way to communicate with foreigners coming to Prague after the regime change, but he fails to adjust to their needs and finally sends them away. He joins an advertising company but, disgusted by a sudden change in the behaviour of his superiors, his former colleagues, he quits.

In Konec světa, there are characters which make similar attempts to integrate within the new post-communist regime and enjoy what it offers although only a few of them are able to do so successfully. These are mainly young people, still full of energy and ideas about the bright future that lies ahead (the narrator's girlfriends Řípa and Petruše) but, even among young people, there are individuals who struggle with depression (Mirka, a girl from the flat next door in 'Zlaté časy': KS) and often end up taking drugs (Beneš's visitors in 'První cizinci v Praze': KS). Most of Hakl's key characters, however, belong to the generation of middle-aged people who have experienced the communist past and are now learning to adjust to the principles of the new capitalist society. This seems to be for many an insurmountable problem. Beneš describes (and meets) individuals who have been caught within a single, tight circle from which they do not have the power to escape, or do not want to escape. So often these characters try, but they end up following the lifestyle of those persons who live on the periphery of society (Fáfa, Smrček, Jirka Vokurka – see below) or in the grey zone (Igor, the old barflies – see below). Many of them position themselves as far away as possible from the official structures and the growing capitalist outlook which does not appeal to them. They feel safer on the periphery of mainstream events because there is no one there who would expect them to behave in a certain manner. On the periphery, they do not feel obliged to act according to the ruling society which expects them to find a well-paid job, build a career, get a mortgage and succeed. There, they enjoy day-to-day life in terms of simple things, basic to one's survival, but far away from the external pressure of the new world.

Ageing, the awareness of passing time and memories are important themes which play a significant role in the individuals' search for their identity within the new world. For Hakl's middle-aged characters (Jan Beneš's friends especially), accepting anything new is difficult and sometimes even painful, almost unbearable. Almost every effort these characters attempt to make in order to change their personal and social situation ends in awkwardness and in surrender. But, whilst this surrender means for some to be 'out' (Fáfa, Smrček, Jirka Vokurka), for others it means to be passively ‘in’ but actively ‘dead’ or ‘in limbo’ (Igor, Lád’a, the old barflies).

How problematic it is for Hakl’s characters to cope with life under the changing political and social circumstances can be demonstrated in the character of the waiter Igor (‘Vzpomínka na Ozzyho’: KS). Igor was:

‘...once a well-known, famous waiter at the U Kafkú pub. At one time he was the only waiter who would occasionally pour you drinks for free; you just had to manage to stay at U Kafkú until closing time with the right people. This wasn’t difficult because they were always the same ones. (...) And Igor smiled, turned a corkscrew, made wisecracks, and he was a king. This was fifteen years ago. Nowadays, with his sleek white hair combed to cover a bald patch he looked like a retired entertainer. (...) He was still a king. Only his kingdom was now covered with cobwebs, many of the subjects in his kingdom had died of heart attacks, had not come back from emigration, stopped drinking and smoking, hanged themselves or drank themselves to death.’

[‘Kdysi známý a slavný vrchní od Kafkú. Býval to svého času jediný vrchní, který příležitostně naléval zadarmo, stačilo tenkrát zůstat U Kafkú do zavíračky s těmi správnými lidmi, což nebylo nijak nesnadné, protože to byli pořád ti samí... A Igor se usmíval, točil vývrtkou, trousil poznámky a byl král. To bylo před patnácti lety. Teď vypadal s bílou ulíznutou přehazovačkou jako estrádní umělec na penzi... Pořád byl král. Jenom se to jeho království tak trochu potáhlo pavučinami, pomřelo na infarkty, nevrátilo se z emigrace, přestalo pít a kouřit, hodilo si mašlí a uchlastalo se.’] (KS: 86)

Igor is a typical example of how difficult it is for the characters of Konec světa to adapt to the principles of the new society, especially for someone who is getting old. As the narrator points out, Igor grew up in communism. He had found his place in one of the local pubs and there he built his reputation as a head waiter who provided his regular guests with shelter and with a few moments of freedom behind a locked door, especially after the official closing times. Years afterwards, when democracy came and there was no longer any need to look for a hidden place to enjoy freedom, Igor had lost his importance. His pub became only a memory of the old times, now swallowed up by the market-orientated environment, and Igor a vendor at an ordinary garden kiosk selling snacks and beverages.

Jirka Vokurka (‘Vzpomínka na Ozzyho’: KS) is another character whom Jan Beneš sees as a person struggling in between memories of the communist past and the contemporary world:

‘Jirka Vokurka lived somewhere there around and led an old-world life; he painted pictures, paid alimony and drank. (...) He was a quiet but persistent man, often seen in a jumper saturated with smoke. His shoes were as though a cow had chewed them. He was like a person from the old times, when the truth and the lie still functioned approximately the way they are supposed to. In those times which may have never taken place.'

[‘Jirka Vokurka bydlel někde tam v okolí a vedl starosvětský život; maloval obrazy, platil alimony a chlastal. (...) Nosil v sobě zvláštní tichou urputnost. Prokouřený svetr. Boty jak vytažené krávy z huby. Byl jako ze starých časů, kdy ještě pravda i lež fungovaly přibližně tak, jak mají. Z časů, které možná vůbec neexistovaly.’] (KS: 86)

In communist times, the waiter Igor was a saviour for many people who found it difficult to fight oppression because he held the ‘door keys to freedom’. Also, Jirka Vokurka was someone who played an important part in terms of freedom. He used his creativity to expose the practices of the communist regime. Igor was a ‘king’ and a happy man because people needed him. However, with the arrival of democracy, everything in his life changed. There suddenly was no need for freedom behind a closed door he provided. With the arrival of the market economy, life became a question of money. State property was privatized and everything became subject to business practice. Igor’s pub was no exception. His pub also became a private business and came to be ruled by the market forces. Igor, who used to share for free what did not belong to him with others, lost his popularity, his respect and, finally, his job. Jirka Vokurka was a recognized artist in the communist era, when art was an important weapon in the struggle for truth, but his existence in the world of capitalism is seriously shaken. He is not the only one who finds himself to be in such a situation. As the old regime disintegrated, art lost its political role and artists lost their privileged position of being the voice of the oppressed Czechoslovak nation. Paradoxically, for an artist from the communist times, the chaotic freedom of post-communism became a bigger problem than was the previous communist oppression (Kratochvíl 1992). Jirka Vokurka, as presented by the narrator of Konec světa, is a victim of this change. The way Beneš describes him he has always been living on the periphery of what can be understood as the mainstream but, nowadays, he is just a shadow of his former self. He is still painting, but his personal appearance (he wears loose jumpers and shabby shoes) is suddenly not as ‘alternative and cool’ as it might have been before. Due to his obsession with his personal grief over his penniless existence, he forfeits perhaps the greatest opportunity of his life. He misses the only serious admirers of his work, when they come, and thus he misses the chance to become once again a well-known and recognized artist. Because these days, the text implies, it is not enough just to be exceptional, you also have to be a good PR manager for your work. Otherwise your voice is lost in the clamour of all the others. And that was what exactly happened to Jirka Vokurka.

In his essay ‘Obnovení chaosu v české literatuře’ (‘The Renewal of Chaos in Czech literature’, 1992) Jiří Kratochvíl comments on the fact that the impact of Czech writers on society seriously decreased after the fall of communism. He states that nowadays Czech writers do not have to act as ‘the nation’s conscience’ anymore as the need which put them into such a position disappeared with the arrival of democracy. Nowadays, Czech literature is free as it has never been. However, at the same time, ‘it has remained alone only in its own company (and the company of a handful of its local readers) in an autistic and solipsistic isolation’ [‘zůstala už jen sama se sebou (a s hrstkou těch nejvěrnějších čtenářů) v autistické a solipsistické izolaci’] (Kratochvíl 1992: Literární noviny: Vol 47:5).

The character Jirka Vokurka is not a writer, but what Kratochvíl says about contemporary literature can also be applied to contemporary Czech visual art. With the arrival of democracy, the writer’s position has changed and so has the position of those persons practising visual art, persons like Jirka Vokurka. We do not know whether Jirka Vokurka is an original artist or not. We might perhaps assume that he was from the fact that a couple of Americans decided to buy all his work which they found on display in a beer garden. What we do know is that he was fairly comfortable to lead a life as it was defined by the rules of the communist system, when there was only one clear-cut entity – the communist state – to collaborate with or to fight against. Jirka Vokurka finds the post-communist regime chaotic and unclear. He either despises the ‘new ways’ or is afraid to accept them. Due to his inability to adjust, Vokurka fails to understand the new role of the visual arts in Czech post-communist society and so he fails. His pictures, displayed on the ropes hanging outside one of the Prague beer garden restaurants, stay unsold. This leaves them ‘in an autistic and solipsistic isolation’. The text indicates clearly that Jirka is unhappy with his failure, but is at a loss what to do about it and so he does nothing, only vegetates:

“Well, man. I would rather be dead today. I am so pissed off! Yesterday, you know... what a day that was! I cannot even go out anywhere. Otherwise I would have to hit someone. The only thing I can just do is to sit here with you, well, of course only if you are not in a hurry...”
 [„Človeče, mně se dneska ani nechce žít, jak jsem nasranej Včera, víš... to zas bylo! Já ani nikam nemůžu jít, jinak bych někomu musel... Jediný, co můžu dělat, je tady s tebou trošku posedět, jestli teda nespěcháš...”] (KS: 88)

2.7 The troublesome present and the ‘golden’ past

When thinking about the present times (and the ‘new’ customs), Beneš expresses many sceptical thoughts about contemporary Czech society. In his thinking about the past (and the ‘old’ ways), there is a certain hint of nostalgia. Beneš talks about his life back in the 1980s in two stories called ‘Zlaté časy’ (‘Golden Times’) and ‘Zlaté časy, díl 2’ (‘Golden Times, part 2’). When he speaks of the present, he speaks in terms of what has happened in his life for the ‘first’ time (‘První cizinci v Praze’ – ‘The First Foreigners in Prague’), in terms of memory (‘Vzpomínka na Ozzyho’ – ‘The Remembrance of Ozzy’) and in terms of the ‘last’ (‘Lád’ovo poslední tango’ – ‘Lád’a’s Last Tango’). When he contemplates the times of regime change at the end of the 1980s and the beginning of the 1990s, he uses words like ‘the end’ (‘Konec světa’ – ‘The End of the World’).

The world in ‘Zlaté časy’ is a world of friendship, of cheap accommodation shared with friends, of wild drinking in various Prague pubs, of hangovers and of women in bed. It is the world of Beneš’s youth, of his life on a day-to-day basis when the only worry comes with the morning headaches, with the thoughts on how to get over the effects of alcohol and marihuana intoxication, how to manage the relationship with one of his neurotic flatmates and how to survive the end of his sexual relationships. In ‘Zlaté časy’, the lives of the individual characters are shown in turmoil but this turmoil does not necessarily mean that the characters have lost control of their existence. As long as they still have a bed, a flat and the company of others, the world is fine. As long as they know what place they hold within society, the world is bearable and safe; as long as they ‘belong’ somewhere, there are no causes for anxiety. The arrival of the new era does not bring them more happiness, it brings them more troubles. These troubles are, for instance, the incoming foreigners, whose extended presence in post-communist Czechoslovakia/Czech Republic is felt to be overwhelming and distracting. The arrival of the foreigners is only the first sign of the changing times which Konec světa records. Then Beneš notes a change in the political and economic functioning of Czech society when he talks about the waiter Igor or about Beneš’s attempts to set up a business. All these changes bother his mind as he observes what is happening with the people around him, worrying that the world has gone mad.

Konec světa shows people such as Jirka Vokurka, Igor and Fáfa who find it hard to face the new post-communist society and who all fail in their attempt to adjust to it – Jirka Vokurka and Fáfa because they lack self-confidence and assertive behaviour, both at work and in their relationships; Igor fails because his principles are in conflict with the new market-orientated values of Czech society. The character of Jan Beneš is caught in Konec světa on the borderline between the world of the new consumerist establishment and the individuals marginalised by it.

2.8 Beneš's relationship with women and his attitude to femininity

2.8.1 Men and masculinities - loss of control

In the chapters above, we have mainly discussed Beneš's attitude to other men. This is purely based on the fact that men are discussed in Konec světa more often and also with more depth than their female counterparts. Nevertheless, Beneš cannot deny that his meetings with various women; women as partners in love and in sex, women as his family members, friends or just those whom he meets in pubs or about whom he learns from other people are of great importance and interest in his life too. As much as he needs the psychological support and unquestioned understanding of his male friends, he needs love and sexual attention from his women to help him deal with his personal struggle for a place within the new 'thrusting' society, and with his search for recognition and love. Friendship and experience of love relationship are two important pillars of his existence in this world. Amongst them he also searches for his own identity and his reason to exist.

There is a significant difference in Beneš's attitude to men and to women. Whilst we learn quite a great deal about his male friends, we cannot really say the same about his women because the information he is giving us about them is fragmentary and the time he spends talking about them is more peripheral than central. The questions are whether this is because he is hiding things or whether this is because he considers his love life to be a private matter not open to everyone; whether this is because he finds his dealings with women too sensitive and painful so that he pushes it to the back of his mind and, instead, talks about other topics which are not so difficult for him, such as his work or his pub friends, or whether he keeps his love life to himself because he thinks he has failed and now he feels ashamed; or, on the contrary, whether he thinks his relationship with women is an unimportant and boring matter and so there is no real reason to provide the reader with more details than what he considers essential for the understanding of his overall attitude to life. Possible answers can be found only by examining what Beneš has decided to reveal and not to reveal to the public. Only from these fragments can we build a picture that gives us some sort of idea about his love life. These fragments will help us to search for an explanation of Beneš's behaviour towards all the female characters that have crossed his path and to women in general. We will discuss his behaviour in the role of their partner, their boyfriend, their lover, their friend, their son and their grandson. The starting point of my analysis will be Beneš's experience of marriage and of some of his most serious and lasting sexual relationships with other women.

Only at one point do we find out that Beneš was married once but, apart from the fact itself, he does not mention anything else about his marriage. He does not go into a detailed description of his relationship with his wife. He just simply announces: 'my marriage had broken down forever and I did not have anywhere to live' ['mně se definitivně zkazilo manželství a neměl jsem kde bydlet'] (KS: 58). Beneš's relationship with the next woman, Řípa, ends up in the same emptiness and, again, he hardly speaks about it. Řípa appears in the text when she brings some foreigners into his flat. She disappears when she decides to leave Beneš for others and for life in a different country ('První cizinci v Praze': KS). There are no revealed memories of Beneš's and Řípa's shared past, only a brief statement that she had been there and that she had left. Moreover, Beneš does not even display any particular sympathy towards this girl; on the contrary, all he talks about is a great relief that her youth, her personal determination and her requirements had disappeared from his life. He is pleased that he has regained his male freedom and his self after their separation was announced:

'She absorbed every new bit of information which had reached her, immediately and fully. I had been living with her for nearly two years and I had got really fed up. I hated her ambitious, selfish, bosomy world. So when she finally tossed her mane of hair and announced that, anyway, she had decided to leave the country, for someone had given her such an offer, basically I was relieved.'

['Nasávala do sebe okamžitě a beze zbytku každou novou informaci, která k ní dorazila. Žil jsem s ní druhý rok a měl jsem toho právě tak dost. Jejího ctižádostivého, sobeckého, prsatého světa. Takže když si nakonec nahodila hřivu a řekla, že se rozhodla a že tak jako tak odjíždí do ciziny, neb jí to bylo kýmsi nabídnuto, v podstatě se mi ulevilo.'](KS: 17)

To go back to the beginning, Beneš's ex-wife represents the world that calls for responsible, reliable and caring husbands, fathers and men, the world he is not able to offer her because he himself struggles with the concept of freedom and with the need to comply with certain obligations. It looks as if he does not want to face the memories of his married past and so he keeps this information secret. Řípa, on the other hand, represents the new, enthusiastic but unstable and unknown world which he finds difficult to accept and he does not want to accept it. She is a young girl. She wants to enjoy everything the present offers; she wants to meet new people, foreigners, because they represent an 'exotic' world; she wants to travel and learn about life abroad or about the world that lies beyond the routine. She splutters with energy and youth and, what is more, she is described as a woman with such physical features ('bosomy world' ['prsatý svět'], 'mane of hair' ['hřívá vlasů']) that would be able to "bring a large number of males to her feet". Řípa is a person of change and that is something Beneš finds hard to cope with. She is open to the public; he values his own privacy, his solitude and the company of the closest friends or harmless barflies above all. She is keen on constantly learning new things; he prefers to hibernate in the world he knows well. She has ambitions and future goals; he prefers to stop, live and contemplate various things that momentarily surround him, and his mind often wanders in the past. She uses her physical features to attract the attention of other people; he sees himself as a creature with nothing to display and everything to hide.

In his study on men and masculinities, Stephen M. Whitehead talks about men's identity in connection with their notion of control and he states that a crisis of men's identity always comes with the loss of this control: 'a key factor in men needing to control is a lack of confidence and inner security about their masculinity, maleness, sexuality' (Whitehead 2002: 165). Applying Whitehead's theory on the character of Jan Beneš, he also seems to have lost this identity in life with his wife after he lost his orientation in the world which seeks gender equality and freedom but requires responsible individuals with strong views in both public and private spheres on one hand (material support, strength and care for the family and love) and complete flexibility and open mind on the other. He lost his identity in his life with Řípa after he lost his inner security and control over his sexuality and maleness, and over his male position and role in their relationship.

What comes out from Beneš's rare and untidy thoughts about his ex-wife is the picture of the woman – representative of the fusion of traditional (man – breadwinner) and modern (help with domestic life) views on family life. Řípa is, on the other hand, the embodiment of the modern pro-democratic world. She is the representative of the 'new' youth – she is not seeking traditional hierarchy and traditional differentiation of gender roles (men for public affairs, women for domesticity); she is searching for adventure and freedom. She is travelling, meeting friends, dating new people and exploring all possible aspects of the 'new' free world. She is her own femininity and her own self and such she is also the downfall of Beneš's male security and role.

In this sense, we may consider Řípa's and Beneš's malfunctioning relationship to be one of the unavoidable characteristics of the modern world which has, amongst other things, affected both characters (and people in general) by a gradual shift in personal identities and gender roles in the social hierarchy of the world; a shift caused by the wave of feminine awareness that has, in its consequences, also 'contributed to the undermining of patriarchy and the male paradigm of control' and so to the personal crisis of men. According to Whitehead, '[a]lthough this process has forced countless numbers of men to reconsider previously held beliefs about male roles and dominant masculinities, it has also, inadvertently, left men with a crisis of confidence. For men are increasingly caught in the pincers of a culture that still expects them to be 'at the helm', yet also requires them to engage in reflexive analysis of their masculinity.' 'Men have no clearly defined enemy who is oppressing them' (Whitehead 2002: 48) and so instead they create their own enemy. This new enemy, though, does not come from the outside world but from their own inner selves as their inability and unwillingness to adapt the 'new' and modern – women's raising public voice and, on the contrary, men's losing centralist position in the relationship and in the world of public affairs –, 'that is, [to adapt] a position where they exist not as a central but as jointly peripheral' (Ibid: 83-84). Jan Beneš, as a man in his mid-years, seems to go through the same identity crisis, not as a person only but as a man too, and that makes him uncertain and lost.

There are many ways of understanding Beneš's attitude towards his relationship with Řípa. Gender aspect is only one of them. Another way is to look at their relationship from the point of their relationship to the world in general. From this point of view, we may argue that with Jan Beneš and Řípa it is the same as it is with Jan Beneš and the world of the people who welcomed principles of the new pro-democratic and pro-capitalist society (he thinks that Řípa is one of them): when he finds them, he enjoys them; after being a part of them for a while, he questions them. In questioning them, he loses the gravity of his position and his personal identity, and finally he leaves. As soon as he is away from them, he feels relieved and appreciates every minute of being free – as now, there is only one identity he has to respond and that is his. But again, this feeling lasts only until he realizes the inevitability of his life in relationship with others and with the 'new' world. For only in relationship with others and only in living the present world he can find his importance and his purpose in life. It is the same circle in which Beneš always finds himself imprisoned. His intensely felt desire to protect his own individuality requires that he should be completely free; his manhood, on the other hand, searches out for heroism, love, passion and the company of others and so it asks him to adapt.

In this sense, we may understand Beneš's expression of relief after Řípa's departure as just a mask to hide his own insecurity, his jealousy towards his partner's public openness, her energy and enthusiasm for life – a mask to hide his desire to act in the same way and also be the one whom she follows and admires. That makes him confused and emotionally lost. That is his crisis. And because he does not know a better way of coping with such a situation, he pretends antipathy and ignorance and decides not to analyse his relationship with Řípa more than it is necessary for his narrative.

Some time after Beneš's break up with Řípa, another woman, Renata, appears ('První cizinci v Praze': KS) – his long-term friend and partner for eight years; also his saviour and protector during the time when he could not cope with his alcoholism. Again, we do not learn much about their life together. Everything we learn about Renata is from the time before they became partners. All that happened between them afterwards is described in a few neutral words and without any specific details or strong emotions.

Beneš's next and, in Konec světa, also the last serious relationship with a woman called Petruše ('Druhá třetina': KS) does not appear until the end of the book.⁴⁸ In between, he shares his bed with various women whom he encounters on different occasions. These are one-off adventures or repeated meetings; none of these relationships lasts for long although he describes some of these sex scenes in quite vivid colours. This is contrary to his real partnership which he mentions only briefly.

First, we learn that Jan Beneš met with Izabela ('První cizinci v Praze': KS), a 'beautiful' woman whom he previously used to see in the streets. Their nights followed their occasional meetings in one of the Prague night clubs and, as the narrator claims, they always ended up in a fiasco. Then a Chinese girl turns up (Ibid.), cleaning his flat, listening to him speaking, even though she cannot understand a single word, and sleeping with him. After her departure, it is Ela, Beneš's flatmate from the years after his broken marriage ('Zlaté časy': KS):

'She was a little bit over twenty. She was not particularly clever, but had an instinct. I never tried to touch her. Once before sunrise, I secretly watched her when she was changing her clothes, but that was all. She looked very good. (...) She had a very pretty figure and so I suffered from fits of shyness whenever I saw her.’

 [‘Bylo jí něco přes dvacet. Nebyla zvlášť chytrá, ale měla instinkt. Jakživ jsem si k ní nic nedovolil. Jednou jsem se nad ránem tajně díval, když se převlíkala, a to bylo všechno. Slušelo jí to.... Měla figuru, vůči které jsem nemohl netrpět záchvaty nesmělosti.’] (KS: 69)

Again, it is attraction to this ‘young’ woman and shyness in approaching her ‘very pretty figure’ which keeps Beneš drawn to Ela while he remains physically distant. Only once does he succeed in breaking the invisible wall that stands between them and ends up in bed with her. Yet this happens as a result of one of his experiences with drug abuse and not as a result of his finally overcoming his shyness or because he has fallen in love.

Perhaps the most powerful is Jan Beneš’s experience of a psychically painful sexual adventure with an ageing female ballet dancer in the Botanic Gardens (‘Konec světa’: KS). The act is described in an expressive, rather naturalistic way; from the beginning, the relationship is marked by mutual sadness, by his personal distaste, and by his cowardice, and it is accompanied with Beneš’s images of the end of the world:

‘She could have weighed about 40 kilos. Above her pathetic dog’s ribs her breasts protruded, screaming for help. Her stomach was criss-crossed with a mash of deep scars; it looked like it had been all slashed and sewn back again. From her under-hanging, girly pelvis, a horrible bushy bogey watched me, hysterically.’
 [‘Mohla mít tak 40 kilo. Nad dojemnými, psími žebry trčela prsa, která hlasitě křičela o pomoc. Břicho měla zbrázděné změtí hlubokých jizev, vypadalo jako rozsekané a zase sešité. Zpod vysdlé, holčičí pánve na mě nepřičetně hleděl strašný, chundelatý bubák.’] (KS: 81)

In this case, Jan Beneš’s view of both their bodies in a mutual embrace does not come with pleasure but rather with fear, and so, as soon as the sexual encounter is over, he leaves her forever. As if in looking at the ageing ballet dancer, Jan Beneš looks at his own reflection and what he sees terrifies him. It is his misery, and his own scars he sees shaping her body, and that scares him. He never comes back to her after this. Another unstable relationship is waiting for him when he meets Radka (‘Druhá třetina’: KS). He describes her as a ginger haired woman with whom it was suicidal to sleep. Every sexual encounter with her was on the verge of violence. She wanted to be pushed to sex; she wanted to be raped by the surrounding world; she wanted to be a victim of the violent world, and this attracted him. This constant presence of violence, attraction and fear, this game on aggressors and victims, this never ending struggle between giving up and fighting for life reminded him of his own self wandering in the world of wanted and unwanted secret thoughts and real actions, and hidden uncertainty of what to do with the internal world of known and the external world of unknown:

‘She was hiding from life. She clearly distinguished that part of reality in which she was at home, and the other one, about which she did not want to know anything at all. That was the main thing that was keeping us together.’
[‘Schovávala se před životem. Přesně rozlišovala tu část skutečnosti, ve které je doma, a tu druhou, o které nechce nic vědět. To bylo to hlavní, co nás spojovalo.’]
(KS: 207)

Radka reminded Beneš of the duality of his own personal ‘I’ – his ‘I’ dwelling purely in his own self, his imagination and thoughts, and his ‘I’ as a living being outside in the chaotic world and that connected them.

Jan Beneš is a kind of man who seems to attract women, in spite of the fact that he describes himself as a completely boring and unattractive person. This is another mask he puts on to attract the attention of women and the reader’s interest in his struggles – by using negative description of his self. He experiences many sexual episodes but no proper relationship ever develops from the described short-lived encounters (and there are more than I have quoted here as examples for the purpose of this research). Jan Beneš is able to spend days and nights embracing a woman’s body but, before something more serious can develop, he often escapes, cutting himself off and going back to his own loneliness. He cannot stand permanent female company but he is also scared because, whenever he tries to live with someone else and love, he fails. However, it is also truth that he cannot be without a woman for a long time because a woman brings him passion, physical proximity, interest and care which he needs too.

Earlier in this chapter, we have discussed Whitehead’s study on contemporary men and masculinities, particularly his study on men and their notion of control in both public and private spheres of life. We have found significant similarities in the men he describes and Jan Beneš, the acting narrator of Konec světa, and in their attitude to long-term relationships and to family lives. This has been done with a closer look at their search for stability and at their individual recognition and freedom. This time we will look at both compared individuals/groups from the point of their understanding the intimacy and trust.

Trust and intimacy are two building stones of the stable relationship and love, as it is trust that enables one individual to reach intimacy with the other one and to exercise pure love. For some, trust and intimacy can be an insurmountable problem, for others it can be an every day practice of their life. Whitehead looks at the notion of trust and intimacy from the gender perspective and he argues that, for contemporary men and masculinity, ‘trust is highly problematic (...), for before one can trust, one must let go of fear and of a desire to control’ (Whitehead 2002: 171). We have already discussed that the notion of control is one of the most important features of male nature and, together with Whitehead, we have accepted the idea that men with control exercise more stability and personal satisfaction than men without control. Trust (and intimacy) is something that comes with friendship and love and, as such, it calls for equality on both sides – that means for loss of control over the other. From this point of view, any relationship may be a highly problematic issue for many men as it is not the relationship they find difficult to cope with but the loss of control, as Whitehead stated, that the relationship brings to their private world. Taking this into account, Whitehead summarizes his observations of men and masculinities by saying that ‘for many men it is the very spontaneity of intimacy/ and trust, that is so threatening and precarious. It is the unscripted response, the unpredictable, uncontrollable situation that many men avoid. In seeking to control the uncertainty that might be generated by emotional intimacy, many men – consciously or otherwise – reach for conventional practices and behaviours and stereotypical masculinity’ (Ibid: 174). One way to avoid this uncertainty, which well-functioning relationship, based on equality, intimacy and trust (and loss of control) means, is not to engage in any serious relationship at all and, instead, to look for satisfaction of sexual desire in short-term encounters or elsewhere. This is because short-term encounters do not require from its participants complete intimacy and trust. On the contrary, they are based on satisfaction of an individual’s needs and momentary desires. That is why, according to Whitehead, many men end up living alone (single or divorced) or keep a lover elsewhere.

The narrating character of Konec světa as we have learned to know him seems to apply the same approach to his life. He tries to live in a long term relationship but, as soon as he feels that he is losing control over his freedom, his individuality and life in this relationship, he escapes. As soon as he fears the loss of his self, he leaves the relationship and stays alone. But, because he is a heterosexual man who needs to satisfy his sexual desires and because he is an adult human being who, from time to time, needs to be looked after and embraced by another human being (like a child by his mother) when feeling down and confused, he searches for the moments of intimacy (not engagements though) with other women. Sexual promiscuity is the solution to his fears. It brings him many intimate moments as we may see from the number of short-term sexual encounters he describes. At the same time, it also takes away his responsibility over the others and his fear of losing his individuality and freedom. Sexual promiscuity gives him a certain freedom to act the way he momentarily likes and not according to the expectations of others.

The picture Whitehead draws about contemporary men living in the pro-democratic world is not very bright in terms of their consistency, their powers and their effort for sustainability of family bonds. It shows men's lack of flexibility and adaptability to the changes which the 'new' and modern world that calls for individual's freedom and for equality of both genders (races etc.) brings. It unveils men's weaknesses rather than their strengths – their inability to comply with life in unity with equally positioned and equally pro-active women.

The picture Jan Beneš draws about himself is not positive either. It shows the man who struggles to cope with the requirements of the 'new' (pro-democratic) and modern world; the man who does not fight but escapes; who does not adapt but rather turns to his own self. It shows a weak man rather than a hero; the man perhaps attractive for those women who seek the attention of big (as he describes himself) and older (or middle-aged) men but even this attraction does not last long. Even these women leave as soon as they recognize that there is hardly any future and security in a life with him – something he cannot, he does not want or does not know how to offer.

2.8.2 Konec světa - the story of men

The world of relationships we have analyzed here is the world we have constructed from the observations of the main narrating character of Konec světa, the man Jan Beneš. It is the world seen from the male perspective of one individual character of the whole story, although sometimes hidden behind the voice of another man. Female perspective is not considered here.

In Konec světa, we see women as quite flat characters (the only exception perhaps being the ageing ballet dancer) just appearing and disappearing in Beneš's life. Other women have no depth, no internal thoughts. What is more, they are often depicted in negative terms because, most of the time, their image is drawn just at the moment when the relationship is breaking down or shortly after it has broken down.

Beneš considers women to be providers of both positive and negative energy; women are for him the source of loving warmth and safety, which he longs for (when hiding with them in bed). Women are for him also disturbers of his privacy and of his male self, which he always carefully protects (see the relationship with Řípa). As seen by Jan Beneš, women bring pleasure but often break a man's heart and drive him to drink. In Konec světa, this happens not only to Jan Beneš but also to his friends. Lád'a goes on a trip to India in order to find peace after his girlfriend has swapped him for another man (he thinks); Fáfa isolates himself from the outside world after an East German girl rejects him; a random man, whom Beneš encounters in the pub, drowns his sorrow in alcohol. He drinks, cries and talks about his wife who has left him ('Vrah': KS).

In Konec světa, it is especially men who are seen as the ones who suffer. Men think themselves as victims of women's constant criticism, their ambitions, their youth and their beauty. It is men who feel humiliated and lost, both when in relationship and out of it. Once again, what women feel about their men is not considered here.

In most cases, women are described as empty bodies with no soul. Beneš gives them only few opportunities to speak about their own personal feelings. Some of these women do not speak at all; they are just like passive figures he meets on his journey through life.

Hakl's women are not given the opportunity to defend themselves. Whatever is said about them is fully controlled by men and by Beneš himself. Beneš gives them only as much space as he needs in order to explain his own behaviour in the matters of love or in anything that is related to his personality and love. Konec světa is purely the history of men and their perception of the contemporary world.

2.8.3 The significance of age

The acting narrator, Jan Beneš, is a representative of the generation born sometime at the end of 1950s or during the 1960s. The stories of Konec světa take place around thirty or forty years later, at the time when Beneš approaches middle-age. The women he encounters as partners or lovers belong either to his own generation (Renata, the ageing ballet dancer, perhaps also the two bar ladies), to the generation born in the 1980s (Řípa, Ela) or somewhere in between the two (Petruše). But the way in which Jan Beneš approaches them is different. While Renata is described as a person who was able to support Beneš in the most awkward situations (sending him home in a drunken state after he had failed to read his literary texts at a public event) and as a person with whom he could talk for hours about anything, Petruše, Řípa and Ela are women whom he feels he will never be able to understand. The three latter women are young. They bring youthful energy but also instability into Beneš's life and that is why he is not able to cope with them for long. After attempting to be in a serious relationship with them, he escapes back to his lonely life. Their youthfulness is too 'alien' for him. It requires too much flexibility, too much effort and too much of a compromise and this he is not able to give.

In Konec světa, women feature not only in the role of Beneš's partners and lovers, they are also friends, mothers, grandmothers and random passers by. Unlike young and middle-aged women who become Beneš's objects of sexual admiration and desire, older women are there to share with him their stories about what they have experienced throughout their lives. Jan Beneš talks to his dead grandmother after enjoying the effects of magic mushrooms; another old lady listens to his stories a minute after he has consumed some drugs with a girl from the neighbourhood. During one of his travels, he speaks to Mrs Olczak, the widow of a navy captain living in the suburbs of Gdansk; at another time, he thinks about his mum and the day he went to collect her funeral casket. These meetings with various older women are rare and often happen only in Beneš's memory and imagination, provoked by a momentary situation or a sudden thought. In such moments, Beneš does not act but simply exists. Whenever he meets an older woman, he feels he does not have to pretend anything or behave like an adult man; he only is. During that time, he regresses to a small boy, Honcek, who did something naughty and now he wants to make his confession and ask for forgiveness, or he just wants to talk about any nonsense that comes into his head.

In a presence of older women, Beneš feels secure and safe. Older women do not threaten him sexually; they do not threaten to unveil his own emotional-sexual impotence. On the contrary, they are here to hear about his wanderings. Older women are not here to judge his individual deeds. They already have all the uncertainty of search for a stable life in love and happiness behind them and their experience is their only advice now. Older women are the embodiment of the already known; they are the embodiment of a security and homely feeling of tradition which Beneš does not have in his current world but which he somehow constantly (but secretly) seeks – in relationship with other people and the external world. Beneš turns to them in need of his own personal peace and in need of support; in need of an anchor point.

Beneš's experiences with young and middle-aged women always pin him down to his life at the present time and lead him to doubt his manhood. On the other hand, his conversations with grandmothers and his memories of his mother clear his head. In Beneš's life, older women represent the wisdom of old age, experience and death. Young women represent the energetic world of the present time. Jan Beneš stands somewhere in between. He acts as a middle-aged man reacting grumpily when someone incautiously invades his privacy. He acts as a wise man when we consider his many thoughts on society and on the world's future. He acts as a young man who enjoys everything life brings, women, friends, drink and walks. Finally, he also acts as a child who dreams about aeroplanes and who allows older people to tell him their own personal stories and to give him advice. Who he is and how he behaves depends on the people with whom he is in particular moment and place.

2.8.4 Hakl's men v Czech society - Hakl's men v modern world

There is one more perspective I would like to discuss in this chapter: whether there is any connection between the narrating Jan Beneš and Czech men living the experience of a falling socialist system and a rapidly approaching new pro-democratic and pro-capitalist way of life; whether there is any pattern in people's behaviour which survived the country's political, economic and social transfer. Ladislav Holý's study, The Little Czech Nation (1996), will serve as the starting point of my analysis.

In his work, Ladislav Holý asks a number of Czech respondents about their views on what is 'traditional' about male-female relationships in the Czech society and then he concludes:

'I was told that men are naturally predisposed to be assertive and women to be shy, tender, and submissive; that men are more guided by reason and rational calculation and women more by their feelings and intuitions; that men are openly confrontational and women likely to resort to subterfuge, flattery, and subtle manipulation from behind the scenes; that men are innovative and willing to experiment and women tend to stick to traditional and time-honoured ways of doing things; that men are firm in their opinions and intolerant of those of others and women less sure of their opinions and more prepared to see another's point of views; that men are egoistic and authoritarian and women unselfish, loving, and caring. At the same time, it is seen as natural for women to arouse men sexually and for men to show sexual interest in them. As in other spheres of life, it is considered natural for men to initiate sexual encounters and for women to show restraint before submitting to their sexual advances' (Holý 1996: 175).

When comparing Holý's findings with characters of Hakl's Konec světa, we notice straight away that his men and women seem to display almost opposite characteristics to the ones Holý's respondents suggested. Hakl's male characters are far from being assertive and firm in their opinions. It takes them a long time before they make a decision and try to enforce it with others (see Jan Beneš's inability to leave his malfunctioning relationship). They are not really guided by reason and rational calculation, for they often act without consideration and on an impulse (Lád'a's Indian journey, Beneš's sexual encounters). They are not very innovative or willing to experiment. On the contrary, they have great difficulty in adjusting to what is new and foreign and they often turn away from everything that seems to be unknown and 'alien' to them (like the enthusiasm of youth). They are quite egoistic but never authoritarian, for they struggle to hold on to the control over their masculine self and anything that means responsibility and care (marriage, a long-term relationship). Their authority is doubted and is never enforced; their ego is exercised more in their numerous escapes to loneliness and in their sexual desire than in anything else. Finally, Hakl's men do not even initiate sexual encounters as it is mostly his women who show interest in men first; at least, this is what the narrating Jan Beneš wants us to believe. Hakl's men are broken individuals with a confused and unstable mind.

Looking at Hakl's female characters, we can hardly see anything they have in common with Holý's respondents either. Women described in Hakl's work are not shy, tender and submissive. On the contrary, his young women are described as independent human beings acting on their own initiative and are free; his middle-aged and older women seem to overcome their shyness and they behave openly and in a friendly manner. Hakl's female characters do not stick to a traditional and time-honoured ways of doing things. They are innovative. They experiment with people, places and styles; they are the characters of a change. Beneš sees them as loving and caring individuals (Renata) but as selfish and ruthless too (Řípa, Petruše). Hakl's women do not show restraint before indulging in sexual activity. They are the ones who are first to show interest and initiate sexual activity. Some of Hakl's female characters are broken individuals with a struggling mind (see the ageing ballet dancer), but most of them are self-confident people who follow their own aims regardless of others (Řípa, Petruše).

What Holý's respondents describe is their idea of traditional behaviour of men and women in Czech society of the 1990s. They refer to the time of the regime change, when people just started realizing what had happened with their old world, but they were still unable to detach themselves fully from the past. By contrast, Hakl's narrative, published in 2001, constructs an image of society which seems to have almost diametrically opposed characteristics. It refers to the decade afterwards, when people had already had a chance to adapt to some of the aspects of the new pro-capitalist regime and they had made an active decision to behave more selfishly and individualistically rather than to obey the rules, or they had made an active decision to step back from the new capitalist world and seek a private, personal space into which they could escape.

Stephen M. Whitehead's study on men and masculinities, which I have used in the first part of this chapter, was published in 2002. This study presents results Whitehead gained from his research done on works of various psychologists and sociologists of the 20th century and from his many years of observations the behaviour of both genders. It describes men and women caught in the turmoil of political and social changes of the 20th century and face-to-face rapidly developing knowledge about the world and the human being in general. Whitehead is looking at both men and women from the point of their roles in society and considers the changes their roles went through within this period of time. Particularly, he focuses on an increasing awareness of femininity and its effects on men and masculinities.

We have already compared the outcomes of Whitehead's research with our perception of Hakl's men (especially Jan Beneš) and we found many similarities in both characteristics. We have also compared the outcomes of Holý's research with our perception of Hakl's men and we found many differences there. What is then significant about Hakl's construction of reality and about the contemporary Czech world?

Whitehead is talking about the position women of the pro-democratic world have in opposition to women living in non-democratic regimes. According to him, what is significant for women of this pro-democratic world is their call for more education and for more recognition and equality in both public and private spheres; what is significant for men is their constant search for power and control. In the pro-democratic world, the traditional role of men-breadwinners and women-family carers is often replaced by the exact opposite or by an equal share. Feminine awareness is reaching various spheres of social life and shifts its traditional hierarchies into the modern world, based on equality of both women and men. Men are made to re-assess their own roles. Their traditionally superior and central position is in the modern world shaken as they are required to accept the individual's freedom and equal share of gender roles. This often brings them into personal crisis and the only way out is to learn how to be tolerant of all the changes that the modern world offers and how to search for new forms of their realization. In the non-democratic world, the position of both genders is often dictated by the authoritarian regime led by men-in public and accepted by women-in private. The tradition based on superiority of men and subordination of women is more preserved here.

The current position of post-communist Czechoslovakia/the Czech Republic has been formed over the years of socialist regime and the series of social changes the country has undergone since 1989. The socialist state was based on supporting women as workers and mothers. After 1989, this form of social support 'has been replaced by a new set of class identities based on an individualist male norm' (True 2003: 21). Women have lost many of their social and economic rights; they have been made redundant more often than their male counterparts and pushed back to their domestic roles. The social welfare system was set up to encourage women to leave paid employment and stay at home. Paid maternity leave was extended and places in nurseries reduced. The number of women in political posts decreased (Ibid.). The Czech government was making a strong effort to bring the country back to the traditional form of social life. What nevertheless happened, according to True's finding, was that 'contrary to government and societal expectations, young Czech women have chosen to keep their jobs and pursue new career opportunities in the market system rather than fulfil their traditional mothering roles and "reproduce the nation" (Ibid.: 67). Following the wave of social development in pro-democratic countries and their socialist tradition, Czech women found their way to stay in the world of the labour force, even though it meant that they had to combine career with domestic life – many of them chose education and career first and family life afterwards.

Taking True's observations into account, we can conclude that, in Holý's findings (see above) published in 1991, we recognize a society of men who still have strong characteristics and a firm position in both public and private worlds; we also see a society of women – bearers of the traditional view on the male-female functioning of the world. Holý questions a society that still carries the aftermaths of the socialist system but already faces new ideas of the Czech pro-democratic government which, in the 1990s, aimed to return the country to traditional forms of gender share instead of accepting the new wave of personal development coming to the post-socialist Czech country from the pro-democratic world.

In comparison with Holý's outcomes, in Hakl's Konec světa, published in 2001, we see both – Czech society still under the rule of the socialist regime (e. g. 'Zlaté časy') and Czech society already experiencing a few years of the new pro-democratic world (e.g. 'První cizinci v Čechach', 'Jedno odpoledne', 'Bouřka'). In the stories set in the socialist past, we meet men who are still somehow anchored in their roles (publicly-recognized artist Jirka Vokurka, waiter Igor holding a key to freedom behind the closed door) or in their relative and careless freedoms (Jan Beneš, Fáfa). In the stories set in contemporary times, we meet the same men but this time, these men experience personal crisis caused by the loss of control over their own lives and over the lives of others (artist Jirka Vokurka and his forgotten art, Jan Beneš and his never ending search for a place in the new world, waiter Igor selling snacks in a small garden kiosk). Beside these men, though, we mostly see determined women who are ready to step into another adventure (Renata – travelling, Řípa – meeting foreigners, travelling) and fight for their not yet forgotten lives (ageing ballet dancer, dancing bar ladies – sexual adventure).

The analysis of Whitehead's, Holý's and Hakl's outcomes makes us realize one important thing: Holý's respondents have more in common with Hakl's past characters living in the transition from non-democratic to pro-democratic worlds. On the other hand, Hakl's contemporary characters stand much closer to Whitehead's men and women living in pro-democratic systems. From this point of view, the behaviour of Hakl's contemporary characters is not surprising. It fully complies with the behaviour of people living in pro-democratic society (incl. Czech society), as observed by others.

In this sense, Konec světa is Hakl's contribution to the image of the contemporary world. It is the image that shows a world built on individualities rather than on social units; the world of lonely journeys rather than joint male-female experiences; a world of gender separation rather than togetherness.

3. The narrating 'I' as a part of the System and outside the System

3.1 Life of work

A professional business career and an influential position in the new capitalist society never meant much to Jan Beneš. But even Beneš could not avoid being involved in new possibilities for individual enterprise after the fall of communism. Just like many others, Jan Beneš starts looking for a new job where he would be able to use his professional skills better than in the Prague Waterworks. He joins an advertising agency. When this does not work out, he opens his own advertising agency and runs it with a couple of his friends. When even this does not work out, he finds a job as a journalist. In between these jobs, he experiences short periods of unemployment.

Jan Beneš's attitude to work changes all the time. There are periods when he feels obliged to work and there are periods when he longs to stay at home and do nothing, perhaps just to enjoy visiting local pubs and watching the world around him. Whilst it seems that he prefers inactivity, he is aware that, if he wants to function in this world, he must participate in it. Often it is the lack of money, a pile of unpaid bills, the suddenly unbearable freedom, boredom or a spirit of a momentary ambition that makes him look for new employment. But, since Beneš is not used to being in a regular job, he has many problems coping with it. Frequently, he tries to overcome his negative attitude towards the official structures and accept the constraints of a regular job.

As a person skilled in literary writing, Beneš usually applies for a job with an advertisement agency and starts to work as one of its ideas-men. At the same time, however, he despises his job as something that works against the nature of the human being. In his view, advertising abuses language to create a new reality in order to manipulate the world instead of making the world more accessible and comprehensible to all:

'I listened to Špitz's babbling, greeted the director and made up all kinds of happy lies which were not allowed to have anything in common with the real world. (...) The money machine could not be stopped; although the money was not and could never be ours, the factory of promises had to go on functioning. We served a beautiful glittering clown of total stylization; a clown with whom it was necessary to speak using a special sterilised, forced, baby language, otherwise there was a danger that he would have a fit; he would begin writhing in pain, bumping into furniture, fall to the floor, vomit gastric juices and bleat: “I don’t understand, I don’t understand...”

[‘Poslouchal jsem Špitzovo žvanění, zdravil ředitele a vymýšlel všelijaké veselé lži, které nesměly mít nic společného s tím, jak život opravdu vypadá. (...) Stroj na prachy se nedal zastavit, sice to nebyly a v životě nemohly být naše prachy, ale slibotechna musela fungovat. Sloužili jsme nádhernému, lesklému kašparu totální stylizace. Kašparu, na kterého se muselo mluvit zvláštním šišlavým, šroubovaným, důsledně předistilovaným jazykem, jinak hrozilo, že by mohl dostat psotník, mohl by se začít svíjet, mlátit sebou o nábytek, padnout na zem, dávat žaludeční šťávy a mečet. „Já nerozumím, já nerozumím... “’] (KS: 199)

Beneš is using the example of his own working experience in order to express his concerns about the ‘real’ and, in his view, the ‘pretentious’ functioning of contemporary Czech society within the official structures of the new, post-communist market economy. Using expressive language, he voices his confusion which he has been feeling since he accepted a job in advertising. He raises grave doubts about the true nature of his work (and language) and about the sincerity of his superiors and his colleagues. He looks at the others and, through them, he sees himself as someone he cannot recognize any more. He is aware of the fact that, by accepting a job, he has joined the official structures and adopted a questionable, in his view, dehumanizing work ethic, and he does not like it. He feels he has become a machine-like creature of blind determination whose only aim is to survive but not to feel:

‘...a flat, yet a little greasy face with a rough-hewn jaw, a minuscule head thrust between my shoulders (...) wearing metallic, opalescent armour, silver cosmic ski boots afoot, a shotgun in my hand, whenever I need it... I am a little assembly kit figure from a children’s chocolate egg.’

[‘...plochý, trochu pravda vymaštěný obličej s hrubě přitesanou čelistí, nicotnou hlavičku vraženou mezi rameny (...), na sobě kovově opalizující pancíř, na nohou stříbřité kosmické lyžáky, v ruce podle potřeby brokovnici... skládací figurka z dětského čokoládového vejce.’] (KS: 205)

Earlier, Beneš described himself as a flour-beetle. In connection with his work, he sees himself as an alien-looking toy or a computerized character. He considers himself as a useless insect that everyone despises and a creature belonging to the artificial world of PC games. Both the images which Beneš uses indicate his feeling that there is something inhuman in the behaviour of his society. He observes a world that, in his view, produces machines but not people; a world that brings alienation and uncertainty to individuals’ lives. It may be his awareness of such things that puts him off any cooperation with the official structures and any relationships with the people who represent the economic, social and cultural elites of the state and hence the power of the state. He seems convinced that it is due to them and their insolent and pretentious behaviour that people lose their grip on reality; that people do not understand anymore what is happening around them and to them. They either blindly follow what is offered to them, like machines, or they seek to escape as outsiders. Jan Beneš examines both positions critically.

3.2 The individual facing the System

To address the individual's position within the power of the System Jan Beneš's states:

‘(...) for sure, the meaning of all this manifests itself undoubtedly somewhere else than where we think. Somewhere in a place which we cannot see from here; and, if we can, it is as if we were in a cage hanging on some oily, steel rope a few metres above sea level, in a cage where a man waits for hours and hours to see whether an angel comes down and lets himself be seen, attracted by buckets of liquidized fish thrown from a ship by a well-paid crew. It is the same crew which is, at the very same moment, comfortably watching a Real Madrid football match on TV while you are waiting down here in suspension, in the middle of a crimson-grey cloud of fish which peacefully descends. From time to time, a madly spinning fish head flies past. And, when one begins to doubt and slowly becomes bored with occupying one's mind with a lot of rubbish ideas, only then the old Grim Reaper appears and smiles, as long as the angel who has come to announce that the creator is pissed off knows how to smile and is allowed to do so. He appears, gives him a stony look and leaves. And then, when you are alone once more, you feel, deep inside, such deep emptiness you have never had a chance to experience so far.’

[‘(...) smysl toho všeho probíhá dozajista úplně jindy, než jsme zvyklí si představovat. Někudy, kam odtud není vidět; a když, tak jenom jako z klece, zavěšené pár metrů nad hladinou na zaolejovaném ocelovém laně, z klece, kde člověk hodiny a hodiny čeká, jestli se mu ukáže anděl, přilákaný kýbly rozmixovaných ryb, které sem seshora z paluby sypou zřizenci, kteří jsou za to – a ne blbě – placeni, a při tom se spokojeně koukají na přenosnou televizi, jak to strká Real Madrid... a člověk čeká tady dole, uprostřed pokojně klesajícího rudošedého mraku, tu a tam kolem proletí bláznivě roztočená rybí hlava. A když už začne pochybovat a začne se nudit a z dlouhé chvíle si vymýšlet hovadiny, tak se mu teprve zjeví zubatec a usměje se, pokud se anděl, který přišel zvěstovat, že se stvořitel nasral, může a umí usmát. Zjeví se, pohlédne na něj dutým okem a zmizí. A teprve potom, když už je člověk zase sám, ucítí v sobě takovou prázdnotu, jakou do té chvíle nepoznal.’] (KS: 194)

It is Beneš's criticism of society that is expressed here; the society which has given up its own significance in order to serve the machinery of an alienated System, blindly and unquestioningly. In this example, the machine (the System) is represented by a ship; people who control the ship are the ship's crew. The man suspended in a cage is fully dependent on both the ship and the ship's crew although he never meets them. He lives in a cage which is hanging on a rope attached to the ship. The cage and the ship are the only reality and also the only certainty he currently has. His only duty is to sit in the cage and wait for his possible advancement. The ship's crew members keep the man under control and in constant awareness of their superior position, but otherwise they ignore him, living their own existence independently of him. Over the years of the seemingly endless waiting time, the man gets so much used to the life in the cage that he never tries to escape, not even after he learns the truth of his whole existence – the emptiness of his whole life. Before, it was a hope for a better future that kept him satisfied with his life in the cage; later, it was just the tiredness of his ageing self that left him with no hope and no power for any change.

Hakl is not the only writer who expresses his concerns about the contemporary society and the individual's position within the System. This issue has been discussed throughout the whole twentieth century. One of the strongest voices came from Franz Kafka (1883-1924). His dehumanized world, which suppresses those individuals who submit to it, certainly comes to mind when thinking about Hakl's fictional world. Kafka's Josef K. and Beneš's caged man from the above example seems to have something significant in common. Josef K., the main protagonist of Kafka's novel The Trial (1920), is arrested shortly after he wakes up. Although he does not understand what he has been accused of, he takes his arrest as a matter of fact that happened but looks for his liberation and release. Jan Beneš's man also finds himself unwillingly encaged. Similarly to Josef K., he takes this limitation as an unquestionable truth and in waiting seeks his release.

The 'trial' is Josef K.'s journey for the search for the truth of his life. It enables him to step out of his routine life and see things he has never seen before because he was too enclosed in himself, too selfish, too self-indulgent and too blind to be aware of the threat coming from the System. And what he sees is a person with 'no belief, in anything or anyone', a person who 'has pride but no self-respect', who 'believes in his own importance' [within the System], 'but not in his own significance' [within his Self] (Bridgwater 2003:183-184). Josef K. sees a person who gave up his individuality in order to become a blind servant of the dehumanized System driven by materialism and power. 'He is guilty of being who and what he is, and of acting against his own first subconscious and then conscious judgement of how he should have been conducting his life' (Ibid: 112-113). He is guilty because he has forgotten how to live and for this he is also punished. 'K. 'dies', and dies like a dog because he has lived a dog's life' (Ibid: 201):

'He raised both hands and spread out all his fingers. (...) But the hands of one of the gentleman were laid on K's throat, while the other pushed the knife deep into his heart and twisted it there, twice. As his eyesight failed, K. saw the two gentlemen cheek by cheek, close in front of his face, watching the result. "Like a dog!" he said, it was as if the shame of it should outlive him.' (Kafka 1920, 2010: 271)⁴⁹

In Kafka's prose, the dog parable is a metaphor of a person who does not have his own free will and who lives only at the mercy of his owner and his/her decision to keep him or not. The dog has lost his freedom when he decided to obey the man. He has sacrificed his freedom for the sake of comfort and as such he is treated, as the man's companion in life but as a creature which is always dependent on others. If he disobeys, he is punished and hence lost.⁵⁰ It seems that the same also applies to K.

In the case of Haki's prose, Beneš's cage man's conscious is awoken after he encounters the old Grim Reaper. Life in a cage is his daily routine, his daily hardship. There he unquestioningly serves the big Other – the ship and its crew – and await his award, in this case the arrival of the angels. The sudden appearance of the old Grim Reaper comes as a surprise but it is a surprise which changes the perception of his own life. The old Grim Reaper is his trial. Without his appearance, the caged man will never be able to uncover the truth of his own existence – the emptiness of his life, the idleness of his existence, the lost Self, his blind servitude to the power of the System (the ship), his animal-like obedience to his superiors, the lack of interest in the needs of his subconscious and distinctive Self. And for this he is also punished. His life will finish in loneliness and empty feelings. This will be his death penalty.

It is their conscious decision to accept life within the System that makes both Josef K. and Jan Beneš's man guilty. The moment they consciously agree to give up their selves to the System and stop questioning it, their path to freedom and salvation is lost forever. The moment they lose their individual significance in order to become the servants of the machine, they lose their future forever. The moment they become selfless animals, they lose their human nature. And when they both realize this, it is too late to change it.

Another similarity between Kafka's and Haki's literary imagination can be found in their use of the same metaphor of a human body being transformed into a gigantic insect. In the case of Haki, it is the character of Jan Beneš who has to deal with such a bodily form when, during one of his occasional sexual encounters, he accidentally looks in the mirror, and there, instead of a man, he sees a larva, a flour-beetle, staring at him from the other side of the room, and he is frightened:

‘I was horrified. I saw a swollen baby, ninety kilos in weight. A larva with a shaven, rapidly blinking human head attached to it. I saw a bald creature insulting Mother Nature’s honest intentions.’

[‘Zděsil jsem se. Uviděl jsem napuchlé devadesátikilové nemluvně. Moučného červa s přimontovanou ostříhanou, rychle mrkající lidskou hlavou. Uviděl jsem jakousi lysou kreaturu, urážející poctivé záměry matky přírody. ’] (KS: 209)

Beneš’s self-consciousness echoes the transformation of Gregor Samsa, the protagonist of Kafka’s Metamorphosis (1915):

‘As Gregor Samsa awoke one morning from uneasy dreams, he found himself transformed in his bed into a gigantic insect. He was lying on his hard, as if it were armour-plated, back and, when he lifted his head a little, he could see his dome-like brown belly divided into stiff, arched segments on top of which the quilt could hardly stay in position and was about to slide off completely. His numerous legs, which were pitifully thin compared to the rest of his bulk, waved helplessly before his eyes’ (Kafka 1961: 9).

The transformation of both characters has the same form, although the outcome differs. As it follows from the above examples, Beneš sees himself as a beetle only for a moment. To Gregor Samsa, on the other hand, the body of a gigantic insect becomes the true and the unavoidable reality of his life. Beneš can still turn his head away from the mirror and forget about it in the arms of his lover. Gregor Samsa cannot do this anymore. His new animal-form is forever. The vision of a beetle confronts Beneš at the time of a momentary lull. It occurs between two of his attempts to enter the structures of the ruling machine. The image of a beetle appears in front of him as a warning of what may happen if he submits fully to the dehumanised power, as Gregor Samsa (and similarly also Josef K.) has done. Jan Beneš only imagines the transformation to happen. His transformation is not final because he has not yet abandoned his life outside the system. Nevertheless, the danger is always present. Only sometimes does the warning manifest itself in the shape of a beetle, sometimes as a mechanised toy or a computerised character.

Gregor Samsa, Josef K. and Jan Beneš’s caged man are personified metaphors of the world which, according to both Kafka and Haki, creates monsters, objects and emotionless characters instead of free individuals. In their fictive world, ‘the beast is a product of [people’s] own blindness, self-centredness and lack of courage, and it springs when [they] realizes that [their] own life has been rendered sterile by [their] efforts to protect [themselves]' (Storr 1985: 23). All three characters represent people who have placed their personal selves freely and unquestioningly in the service of the dehumanized system for which they are punished. They have all sacrificed their human lives for the sake of the machine and when they realize that it has been nothing but a delusion, it is far too late to change it. Jan Beneš is aware of this and that is why his transformation is not complete.

Why we think of Franz Kafka when analyzing Haki's prose can be supported by another factor. Franz Kafka's account of an absurd world appeared at the time of vast political and social changes in Czech society at the beginning of the twentieth century. Kafka's literary work was a reaction to the times in turmoil; times which produced wars and general confusion and chaos instead of prosperity, a decline of the traditional values instead of their strengthening and the introduction of new ways of thinking and behaviour. Kafka's work is a reflection on the question of identity (of Prague Germans whom Kafka was), alienation and isolation (feeling of nowhere to go) in a given historical moment. His characters live in Prague but the Prague of their days is suddenly changing and they cannot recognize it anymore. The old part of the city is under reconstruction and a new periphery with modernist admin buildings is being built. His characters feel lost within these changes. But they feel even more estranged and isolated after the changes affect the country's politics and so the everyday reality of their life. Being Prague German amongst the vast majority of Czechs who became, after the fall of the Habsburg monarchy, leaders of their own state was not the easiest thing and Kafka's characters react to it with depression. Suddenly, they feel the alienation (and the minority) of their own existence in Prague. They feel their own isolation from the place which used to be their home and from the society which used to be the place of their own realization and safety. They feel lost.

Kafka's writing reflected a society which has been disrupted by its failing system, yet corrupted by its own blind contribution to it. And it was society, though presented by certain individuals, that was arraigned, found guilty and punished in Kafka's works – for its 'slavish submission to the system in which [it was] enmeshed' (Robertson: Kafka 2009: XXV).

Haki's literary work was written almost a hundred years later but it also describes society undergoing a rapid change. Haki's writing bears witness to people who find themselves living in the remains of the old communist regime but who already have to put up with the machinery of the new pro-Western capitalist system and this confuses them. The completely new situation which they have helped to build brings into their lives many changes and this puts them under pressure. And, like Kafka's heroes, many of them react to it with depression and feelings of chaos.

As it is in Kafka's work, also Hakl's characters experience all the changes in the country's political, economic and social orientation in Prague. They see Prague as it is transforming into a place of consumerism and commerce and into a place full of foreigners and foreign businesses and it makes them confused. Prague is changing in front of their eyes and they do not know how to respond to it. Their home is changing and they do not know how to live up to it. And so they feel more and more isolated and estranged in the world of 'now'.

Also in Hakl's work, it is a society which is being a target of the author's criticism and his sceptical eye. It is a society which has allowed itself to become a victim of its own doing without even questioning it.

3.3 The 'Quake' and the 'Cthulhu'

In another example of Hakl's imagery, it is again Jan Beneš who is the centre of Hakl's thoughts and again it is he who speaks about his doubts concerning humans and their position within the world of today. Only, this time, he does not approach this world with 'Kafka's eyes' but, instead, he looks at it from the perspective of someone who has been living in a virtual reality of PC games and literature and who is conscious of their hidden powers:

'I was blundering around the labyrinth of a computer game. I was totally absorbed in it. (...) At the beginning, it was quite a common thing that I had to get up quickly and go and throw up. Although gradually, I got used to playing. I was becoming a part of a reality behind the looking glass. That game was called Quake. After several months of wearisome time sitting in the chair, I finally reached a rock cathedral with its ceiling disappearing somewhere in eternity. And there, in the middle of the spluttering pool of lava, a living thing was waiting, waving at me with a bunch of rotten tentacles. It wanted to teach me about the futility of all sensible effort and also about desire and its victory over mere mechanical existence, no matter what desire and what existence. His name was Shub-Niggurath... (...) In those days I had a new body. (...) It looked like a little assembly-kit figure from a children's chocolate egg (...) I managed to survive there for a year exactly. Then I typed out my letter of resignation on a Macintosh computer and left.'

prskajícího lávového jezírka, na mě čekal něčemu živému podobný tvor, mávající pugétem hnijících chapadel, aby mě poučil o zbytečnosti každého rozumného snažení a zároveň i o vítězství touhy nad pouhým mechanickým bytím, ať už je ta touha a to bytí jakékoliv. Jeho jméno bylo Shub-Niggurath...(…) Měl jsem v té době nový tělo.(…) Vypadal jsem jako skládací figurka z dětského čokoládového vejce. (...) Vydržel jsem to přesně rok. Potom jsem napsal na počítači značky Macintosh výpověď.’] (KS: 205)

Beneš begins working at an advertising agency again, after a period of unemployment. However, as he becomes integrated into the system, he starts getting warning signs in his mind. Suddenly, he imagines himself to be a player in a new ‘computer game’ and quickly he ‘gets used to playing’. He adapts to the new environment and soon follows all the rules of the game. It is not until about a year later that he breaks down and realizes he cannot go on. He starts drinking and has visions of himself being transformed into an inhuman form. He thinks his life has become a labyrinth of various corridors through which he has to pass in order to set himself free. And this he can do only by leaving his job once again and so he does.

In Beneš’s view, the world within the System is a world of reason, order, structure and an exhaustive effort to protect them. The world outside the System is a world of emotions, but also a world of personal confusion and chaos. The journey, which leads from one of these worlds to the other, goes through a labyrinth, or the ‘Quake’. In Beneš’s playful mind, the gate dividing the System and the outside world is guarded by Shub-Niggurath. From external sources, we know that Shub-Niggurath is an entity of an ambiguous character which comes from two different worlds – from the world of a PC game called the ‘Quake’ and from the mythical world of ‘Cthulhu’. In the description of the ‘Quake’, Shub-Niggurath is:

‘the absolute ruler of the demons and monsters. (...) She has spawned an army to invade the Earth using the humans’ own portal technology. (...) [She] spawns hundreds of demons but has no attacks of her own, relying purely on the power of her children. (...) None of the players’ weapons can hurt Shub-Niggurath, making her practically invulnerable.’ (<http://quake.wikia.com/wiki/Shub-Niggurath>)

In other words, Shub-Niggurath is the embodiment of the ‘imposing’ system, the absolute ruler of the alienated inhuman world. She is the ‘imposing’ ideology and the ‘imposing’ power that uses those who respond to her will to destroy the others, those who are still free (human). She uses the humans’ weapons to fight humans. The second image of Shub-Niggurath is an image of the ‘Cthulhu’ goddess, a deity belonging to the realm first mentioned in H. P. Lovecraft’s (1890-1937) The Last Test (1928). According to this myth, Shub-Niggurath is a goddess of life who rules over sexuality and all possible forms of pleasure and creation. Her power is in the bohemian lifestyle. Phrases that characterize her best are ‘women, wine and music or sex, drugs and rock ‘n’ roll’ or ‘life is not to be lived but enjoyed.’ ‘She responds to the principle of emotions, she is the antinomy of intellect’ which is represented by her partner, Nyarlathotep’ (<http://acetda.blog.cz/1007/shub-niggurath-a-nyarlathotep>).

Shub-Niggurath, who is waiting for Beneš at the end of his path which goes to the centre of the labyrinth, is a creature of two powers. The first power is employed to teach him ‘about the pettiness of any sensible effort.’ Here, Shub-Niggurath is a ‘Quake’ being. She embodies the System and the inevitable destiny of each human being who gives up his/her life in order to serve the will of the System. But Shub-Niggurath is also a guardian who wants to teach him ‘about desire and its victory over the mechanic existence of the self.’ Here, she is ‘Cthulhu’, a goddess of life, of enjoyment (‘sex, drugs and alcohol’), of emotions and chaos. Shub-Niggurath is both. She has two faces. She is Jan Beneš and the never-ending controversy of his unstable life.

As we consider Shub-Niggurath to be one of Beneš’s solipsistic visions of his self, we may consider both the world of the ‘Quake’ and the world of the ‘Cthulhu’ to be his perception of reality that surrounds him. He sees the world as a game (of successes and failures) and as a place where two powers of supernatural character clash – one of reason and one of the heart. Beneš copes with both dimensions of the game in his own way, although he often struggles to find a way through them and around them.

3.4 A ‘latent deserter’

It is the combination of fear and personal distaste towards any form of officialdom (the System) that drives Beneš away from the establishment and makes him concentrate on what he considers to be ‘more real’ and therefore ‘human’, on identity of the individual and on the freedom of the self. Whenever he reaches the point where he is exhausted from all the effort to be a successful man in the ‘prosperous’ world, he quits all his jobs and becomes a ‘domestic animal’, hiding away in his flat, his burrow, going out just to get the daily products essential for his survival or to drink with his friends who lead their lives on the margins of society:

‘...I did not want to go back into dungarees, I had already tried that, and neither did I want to wear ties; I had tried that as well. I just wanted to walk on cobblestones, every morning to the newsagent's round the corner, to buy fags and the newspaper and then simply go straight home again. And so I did.'

[‘...Do montérek se mi nechtělo, to už jsem zkusil, a nechtělo se mi ani do kravaty; to už jsem měl taky za sebou. Chtělo se mi jen každé ráno jít po kočičích hlavách za roh do trafiky, koupit cigára a noviny a jít zase pěkně rovnou domů. A tak jsem to tak dělal.’] (KS: 225)

Beneš often presents himself as a person who does not care much about his career and about a successful position within the world of profits. He tries various things but he never succeeds. He does not succeed because he does not want to (as in the example) or because he cannot:

‘I could not think of anything at all I could support myself by. (...) Perhaps I did not know the right tricks; actually I did not know any tricks at all. I only knew what every idiot did: to find a job and then do it.’

[‘Ani náhodou jsem neuměl vymyslet, z čeho budu živ. Asi jsem neznal ty správné triky; neznal jsem vlastně vůbec žádné triky. Uměl jsem jenom to, co každý vůl: najít si práci a tu pak dělat.’] (KS: 240)

There are two sides to Beneš's personality: the one, described above, which tends towards his wish to lead a simple life with no stress, with no external pressure and with no worries about his place in its ‘voracious machinery’ of production and consumption. This part of his personality always takes him back to his internal self. The individualised stance in his case equals a conscious escape from society into his own privacy, to his home burrow and to the seclusion of his own mind. Beneš in no way strives to assert himself in society as a strong personality to be known and admired by others. Occasionally though, he feels compelled by the changing times and by people's expectations to leave his lair and venture into the outside world. In those moments, he tries to pull himself together, plucks up his spirits and goes to find a job. But the enthusiasm he brings to the new work quickly burns out. Disillusioned, Beneš quits and quickly turns back again to his own lonely world, to idleness and presumed comfort and safety. The resumption of his solitary life has cleansing effects but only until he is again driven by renewed inner or outer pressure to work, earn money, socialize, become successful, find a partner, and make love.

For Beneš, life seems to be like a never-ending cycle. He repeatedly leaves his solitary lair to interact with the outside world and then again returns to being on his own. He is repeatedly within himself then out in the world; in the centre of mainstream society or out of it, with his marginalised friends. It is his lack of stability which makes him struggle with his own personality, with people and with work; with the past and the present times. It is his desire for stability that brings him back to interactive life.

Jan Beneš is a confused personality who struggles between how he views his individuality within contemporary society and outside it. He is trapped in his own inability to decide whether to belong to mainstream society, whether to work, socialize and discuss common things, or whether to search for his own perceived true identity. Being immobilized in this cycle for the whole of his life, he finally resigns himself to the fact that he cannot escape from these two extremes and so submits with some sort of clarity and level of self-acceptance that he is who he is:

‘All over the world, a war of the practical majority of people against the impractical minority is being fought night and day... I realized that, no matter which side I take in the future, I will always be a latent deserter...’

[‘Ve dne v noci po celém světě probíhala válka praktické většiny proti nepraktické menšině... Uvědomil jsem si, že budu vždycky, ať už se v budoucnu octnu na kterékoliv straně, vždycky budu latentní dezertér.’] (KS: 148)

Beneš’s inability to decide whether he wants to be one or the other was the result of his own internal doubts. His doubts are the result of his observation of the real; his observations of the real are his reflections on the world which he sees in a constant fight between the ‘practical majority’ and the ‘impractical minority’ of humans. His nature and his lifestyle turn out to be more sympathetic towards the latter group. Yet their ‘impracticality’, which often represents them, scares him, and that is the reason why he often returns to the ‘practical’ and the ‘majority’. However, being part of the ‘majority’ does not give him enough freedom to move and so he ends up again in the sidelines with the minority.

Beneš’s recognition of himself as being a ‘latent deserter’ is a form of escape from the reality he sees around him. It is either an escape into his thoughts and into the comfort of life without any expectations or, on the contrary, an escape into mainstream society and into the functioning world. Both directions can bring him a certain satisfaction if he is willing to accept them, and both can bring him fear, insecurity and chaos if he starts to question them.

As we have noticed, Beneš is a thinking individual who does not seem able to adapt permanently to either side. He will always question the reliability of the world which enables the ‘practical majority’ to create the rules and use them to rule over the others. That is where his images of the dehumanized virtual reality of computer games, alien-looking toys made of plastic and steel and visions of the ‘steel city’ come from. He also questions the so called ‘freedom’ of the ‘impractical minority’ and critically observes their chaotic and lost selves. That is where his fear of individual responsibility over one's life comes from. This is where his silence with regard to his failed marriage and lost family life originates.

From the above mentioned perspective, life according to Jan Beneš does not seem very optimistic. Beneš claims that a man is either a part of a machine within the System or a dysfunctional individuality outside the System, wandering in chaos and oblivion.

4. 'To see, to feel and to re-tell': places and their narratives

4.1 'Seeing': advertising, information and others

Beneš's awareness of the unbreakable cycle of his life and his acknowledgment that he is an 'eternal escapee' increases his need for a rich internal world. He often closes himself off in a bubble of his own solitude where he plays with all the impulses his mind produces in response to outer reality. In those moments, he forgets about all the external responsibilities he has in his life and just quietly observes what is happening in front of his eyes and comments on it. He carefully notes everything around him and then 'digests' it. The stories of the people he encounters, the places where he grew up and which he shares, his dreams, films and TV programmes fill his life and give him enough entertainment and pleasure to survive in this chaotic world. Nothing is more interesting for him than the stories life provides. Everything else, according to Beneš, is only a mask which people put on, pursuing the idea of a 'better' world but are rarely successful in creating it. Jan Beneš looks for any excuse to defend this personal attitude. He does not show any desire to become a well-paid, working, married man who has achieved his goals and has set out his aims; his ambition is to live and, throughout this 'living', to see, to feel and to re-tell. That seems to be the sum total of his wishes, his purpose for living and also his personal excuse for all he has been doing so far.

'To see, to feel and to re-tell' are the three verbs that follow Jan Beneš everywhere he goes. Even when he chooses to find work within official structures, he applies for jobs in advertising agencies or in magazines. Then these three verbs become also his source of subsistence.

In general words, advertising and work in the media are the professions in which 'words' and images are the means of information and misinformation about society and about the world. Almost all of the pictures and information people nowadays have about the world are gained from television, radio and the newspapers. The media guide people's experiences. The media tell people what they want to be, how to become what they want to be, how to feel about their position within the world and how to find a way out of their current position if they find themselves unhappy with it. By doing so, the media destroy the individuality of each human self (Mills 1995: 87-88) in the name of the mass. Jan Beneš is aware of all these powers the media have. This makes him interested but this also makes worried. Jan Beneš is not an ambitious person; he does not seek to use the media and the words as a means of getting into the highest echelons of society. However, he likes playing with them and with the impact they have. The power of the advertisement and the words attract him but scare him too:

‘I wrote advertising copy. Later, whenever I walked the streets and was confronted without a warning by one of those silly texts I had created, I was always rattled. Whenever those big black letters yelled at me from the side of a house or a billboard or jumped out of the page of a magazine at me, I was always truly scared. I do not know why. I was never able to shake off this feeling.’
[‘Psal jsem reklamní texty. Vždycky když jsem pak někde na ulici bez varování natrefil na jednu z těch pitomostí, které jsem vymýšlel, ve mně hrklo. Pokaždé, když na mě zařvala ta velká černá písmena ze zdi baráku nebo z plakátovací plochy nebo ze stránky časopisu, jsem se upřímně leknul. Nevím proč. Nikdy jsem se toho nedokázal zbavit.’] (KS: 197)

The advertising world and work for the media become a major source of income but also a nightmare for Jan Beneš. As he says, he is ‘always rattled’ when being ‘confronted by one of those silly texts’ he has created, although he admits that he does not know why he feels like this. The answer may lie in another section of the text in which Beneš remembers himself walking home with an urn containing his mother’s ashes in a plastic bag decorated with slogan advertising: ‘GORBATSCHOW WODKA, CLEAR WODKA SPIRIT’ [‘GORBATSCHOW WODKA, ČISTÝ DUCH VODKY’] (KS: 194). It is the same sign which he finds above the bar in a brothel he visits with his younger colleagues from Libeň Waterworks. The awkwardness of the situation which transforms the serious into the ridiculous and enjoyment into apathy may be exactly what Beneš has in mind when he talks about a ‘spirit’. ‘Gorbatschow wodka’ is not only a product to him (a product that makes people drunk and oblivious) but a series of words referring not just to alcohol but also to his past under the communist rule⁵¹. It is a slogan (‘come and get me!’). It is a metaphor for him, a ‘spirit’ from this world that, in his view, has not yet managed to digest the past (the traumas of the communist era, the fact that his mother has died, that his youth is gone) and already has to fight with the new (capitalism, consumerism, loneliness and ageing). The urn in a polythene bag with the sign, 'Gorbatschow wodka', is a sad paradox of Beneš's life; it is an ironic picture of what he sees as a reality of this world.

There are other reflections that arise in connection with Beneš's scepticism. For example, why is it that he is shocked when he sees his own 'big black letters' shouting at him from various billboards or magazines? Does he feel ashamed of being a part of the state's official policy that plays on people's emotions and uses their weakest points to fulfil the country's market-orientated targets? Does the existence of slogans on billboards remind him of the past when similar signs were created to celebrate the 'greatness' of the united communist nation and to suppress the identity of individual human beings? Is it both the present and the past that, in their joint effort to suppress one thing in the name of power, make Beneš shuddering?

Advertising, banners and slogans have always been instruments of propaganda and propaganda has always been the instrument to promote the idea of one's political and economic strength. Propaganda is a technique used to influence the action of each individual by manipulating various representations of the world (Lasswell 1995:13). Every system uses the power of propaganda to rule people's lives. It attacks their choice of lifestyle, their political views and their personal philosophy. Propaganda seeks the destruction of all that arises from the individual human being and what is associated with freedom; it wants nothing else but absolute obedience to its principles. Propaganda turns each individual into a deaf spectator who knows that something is going on and that something somehow affects him/her (rules, regulations, taxes, wars) but he/she does not see a way that he/she can direct this (Lippmann 1995: 47).

Jan Beneš is exercised by the pernicious influence of advertising because advertising (and so his participation in propaganda) is a source of his income. It is his way to become a successful business man (he sees his own slogans on buildings) but also a source of his demoralisation (he sees himself as a servant of the economic power machine). He enjoys these and he does not enjoy any of these. He cannot decide and so he always dwells somewhere in between.

Advertising is not the only thing that bothers Jan Beneš in his account of the present world and his position in it. Apart from advertising, he notes that there is suddenly an information overload. There is a sudden influx of Western travellers ('amusing buggers, demons, lonely beasts and melancholic freaks' ['zábavné bestie, démoni, samotářské šelmy a smutní podivíni']) and later 'pretentious yuppies' ['vtipní, dobře oháknutí vrabci.']) (KS: 144-145). There are suddenly foreign words, foreign languages and foreign cultures. The borders have opened. American programmes flood TV channels and cinemas, Western technologies are omnipresent. Everything becomes ambiguous for Jan Beneš – joyful and irritating at the same time. Foreigners coming to the country enliven his life, yet he is glad when they leave: ‘A new, kind, familiar and empty world opened up in front of me.’ [‘Otevřel se přede mnou nový, vlídný, důvěrně prázdný svět.’] (KS: 18) Foreign languages and cultures appeal to him as long as he is able simply to observe them. However, being among foreigners and foreign words makes him feel lost and foreign himself. And so one thing he does to make this world more familiar to him is that he thinks about English words through Czech phonetics (Czech people – ‘ček pípl’; Joseph – ‘Džouzeř’; where are you from – ‘verárjůfrom’).

Opening the borders to Western languages, foreigners and foreign influences bring also freedom to travel to Hakl’s characters. This gives them the opportunity to move out of the Czech Republic and to learn about the world. And so some of them go and travel (Lád’a travels to India, Řípa to France, Renata to London). But again, Beneš looks at the possibility of free travelling differently:

‘Really, there is no need anymore to travel across the continents and photograph waterfalls and pyramids. That used to be. Basically, the current world is without mystery because the population of the planet is now all the same. For a long time, they were trying to become the same and now they have succeeded. Nowadays, those who have courage and good nerves, those who long for real adventure, stay at home. They sit, look around and listen.’

[‘Opravdu, už není třeba se štvát po světadílech a fotit vodopády a pyramidy. To bývalo. Svět je v podstatě už bez tajemství, protože obyvatelstvo planety se od sebe přestalo lišit. Tak dlouho se o to snažili, až se jim to podařilo. Dneska ten, kdo má odvahu a dobré nervy, kdo touží po opravdovém dobrodružství, sedí doma. Sedí, dívá se a poslouchá.’] (KS: 226)

He accepts that travelling may be an experience of a considerable significance for some (Lád’a’s trip to India which changed his perception of life) but he does not think that it brings people more happiness, knowledge and better life. And so Hakl’s characters travel but they come back to the Czech Republic, their own country. Beneš himself does not travel. He befriends foreigners but he always returns to his Czech friends and to Czech society.

Beneš observes this new ‘other’ world from a considerable distance, yet he cannot avoid being involved in it, especially with all the changes that keep happening in front of his eyes on a daily basis. He neither rejects the mores of new Czech democratic society, nor is he enthusiastic about it. Beneš also feels the same about the country’s integration into the ‘old’ democratic Europe. He is not sure whether to be happy about it or not. In his view, current Europe is:

‘...a ‘biedermeier’ guest room; a room with a nice cup of coffee on an embroidered tablecloth, and a semolina cake on the table... Twenty, thirty years this lasted and nothing happened but, in the end, the doorbell rang, all the moths flew up, the chambermaid stiffly walked to the door, opened it wide and, her jaw clattering idly, gabbled with a hollow voice: “We... have... been... expecting... you... come... in...”

[‘...ten biedermeirový pokoj pro hosty, pokoj s kafičkem na háčkovaném ubruse, s bábovkou na stole... Dvacet, třicet let to trvá a nic se neděje, ale nakonec se přeci jen ozve zvonek, moli vzlétnou, pokojská toporně kráčí ke dveřím, otvírá dokořán a sanice jí naprázdno klapne, když dutým hlasem odřikává: „Už... na... vás... čekáme... pojd’te... dál...”] (KS: 24)

The grotesqueness of this image only underlines Beneš’s uncertainty with which he looks at the whole new world that has been opened to Czech society after the regime change. He feels that ‘these were bright and erratic times’ [‘byly to pestré, proměnlivé časy’] (KS: 20) full of ‘the buzzing vapour of talk’ [‘bzučivý opar řeči’] (KS: 5) and yet he also feels that they did not bring anything significantly better. Integration of the Czech Republic into democratic Europe is only an outcome of the ongoing political changes to him – something that has been expected not so much as welcomed.

4.2 ‘Feeling’: the city of Prague

Beneš’s passion for ‘seeing’ and ‘feeling’ is also centred on Prague, because it is exactly Prague that stands for the genius loci of Konec světa and of the vast majority of Hakl’s works.

In Hodrová’s theory, ‘the nature of a place is usually associated with the nature of a person who dwells there or who moves around there. To a great extent, a place determines a person and a person determine a place’ [‘povaha místa bývá spjata s typem postavy, která se v něm zdržuje, nebo se jím pohybuje, místo do značné míry determinuje postavu a postava místo.’] (Hodrová 1997: 18) In this sense, Prague is also the place that determines Jan Beneš’s life and at the same time Jan Beneš is the person who determines this Prague. Jan Beneš’s Prague means boroughs of Žižkov, Bubeneč, Letná, Libeň and Smíchov; the streets of Na Záhonech, Mostecká, Pernerova, the parks of Stromovka and Letná; local restaurants and pubs like Šlechtovka, U Modré hvězdy, U Pšenice, U Sládečků. In Konec světa, we learn hardly anything about the historical testimony of old-town squares, gothic cathedrals and renaissance palaces. Jan Beneš’s Prague is not a city that hides magical labyrinths, magical places and secret messages about other civilizations, as it does in books by Michal Ajvaz (b. 1949). Neither is it a place of mystique, as it is in the literary fiction of Miloš Urban (b. 1967). It is not even a culture depository of the Czech nation, a place of bustling businesses, shopping zones, blooming parks and attractions for tourists. It is his home and the reality of his daily life.

Beneš does not embrace the Prague Castle or St Vitus Cathedral but the tower of the television transmitter which:

‘illuminated by the sun (...) stood ankle-deep in the paddling pool of houses, as though it was a feature from a book by Jules Verne. As if Verne’s Steel Town began to rise from there, from somewhere in the mists above the Žižkov hillside.’
[‘Světlem zalitá věž televizního vysílače stála po kotníky v brouzdališti domů jako atribut z verneovky. Jako by tam někde v té mlze nad stráněmi Žižkova už začínalo Ocelové město.’] (KS: 5)

His walks do not lead across the well-known Charles Bridge or along the banks of the river Vltava, but along one of the built-up sites of Prague’s Botič stream:

‘Taking a narrow path, I slowly approached the banks of the Botič stream. I entered a stinking rat jungle full of scum, mud and waste. Skeletons of dumped buggies and ironing boards were waiting for me in the gloom.’
[‘Po úzké pěšince jsem pomalu došel k Botiči a vstoupil do smrduté krysí džungle, plné pěny, kalu a odpadků. Kostry vyhozených kočárků a žehlicích prken číhaly v přítmí.’] (KS: 37)

In his view, the evening sky above Smíchov borough is covered up with ‘shining sheet-metal clouds’ [‘zářící plechové mraky’] (KS: 177). The autumn in Letná borough has a ‘taste of iron and aluminium’ [‘železná a hliníková chuť’] (KS: 243). With the coming darkness, ‘blackened fingers of the Vyšehrad church point up to the sky’ [‘ukazovaly do nebe zčernalé prsty Vyšehradu’] (KS: 177) and the Castle ‘is reminiscent of a cracked distillation apparatus, abandoned in a corner of a dusty closet’ [‘vypadal jako prasklý destilační přístroj, odložený v koutě zaprášeného kabinetu’] (KS: 91). At the end of the summer, ‘the points of the spires of the Emauzy monastery ripped the dense sky above the river embankment as if they were a snake’s teeth’ [‘špičky Emauz páraly neproniknutelnou oblohu nad nábrežím jako hadí zuby’] (KS: 48). The restaurant, U Modré hvězdy, is located ‘behind the Radlice footbridge, on the bank of a railway landscape full of signal lights, switch tongues, wires, dead cats and shining rail tracks’ [‘za radlickou lávkou, na břehu železniční krajiny plné signálních světél, výhybek, drátů, chcíplých koček a zářících kolejí’] (KS: 169). ‘The ball of the Libeň gas-holder’ [‘koule libeňského plynojemu’] represents an ‘optimistic replica of the Globe’ [‘optimistickou kopii zeměkoule’] (KS: 184). From the train going from Libeň railway station to Prague Central Station, one can see ‘the tiny, childlike borough of Libeň’ [‘drobounká dětská Libeň’] and then also ‘a factory chimney’ [‘tovární komín’], ‘house for invalids’ [‘Invalidovnu’], ‘the courtyard full of scrap trucks and buses, a crane called “the cat”’ [‘dvůr plný vyřazených nákladňáků a autobusů, jeřáb, zvaný “kočka”’], ‘boarded house galleries’ [‘oprýskanými palubkami obložené pavlače’] and ‘laundry, hanging on rotting clothes-lines’ [‘prádlo na puchřících šňůrách’] (KS: 135). And the beer-garden restaurant Šlechtovka is located on the ground ‘bearded with grass and nettles’ [‘travou a hluchavkami zarostlý’]; in a place ‘adjacent to the ruins of a small manor house from one side, to a hollow brick wall from the second side and to a dead fence from the third side’ [‘obklopený z jedné strany ruinou záměčku, z druhé vykotlanou cihlovou zdí a ze třetí prkenným plotem’] (KS: 85).

Beneš looks up in order to see heavy clouds and steel constructions; he looks ahead in order to see ‘ordinary’ streets with ‘ordinary’ people standing by and ‘ordinary’ pubs filled with ‘(extra)ordinary’ people’s lives. In his city, there is no emphasis on the historical background of the place. On the contrary, what we find in the centre of his attention is a contemporary image of Prague and his momentary impression of it – it is the image of the night as it reminds him of the world of dark, fantasy fiction. It is industrial as it evokes Verne’s idea of the ‘Steel Town’ (see above). It is shabby and colourless as Beneš reflects upon the concrete architecture of recent times and what has remained of it. His Prague is either dark and grey, or metallic yellow and silver as it gleams in the sunlight or in the light of the local street lamps. His Prague does not have many colours. It is rather ‘ordinary’ and raw, but sometimes it also shines. It is full of contradictions and also full of individual stories and small surprises – within its sites and its residents. It is vibrant, yet dull too.

Beneš’s attitude to Prague and to life within is ambiguous, in terms of colours and especially in his feelings towards the place. In Prague, he feels alienated and at home at the same time. There, he experiences fear and hostility when he observes how the atmosphere in the city has changed with the arrival of the consumerist-based economy and Western influences. He feels a sincere affection for the place which has always been his home:

‘I am going home by subway. In my carriage, couples who do not have any words to exchange anymore stare at the same spot ahead. There are two happy-looking schoolgirls giggling over the Girl magazine. A lady with a wrinkled face which is covered by a coat of face-powder is on her way to the theatre, her fur-coat on. The regime has returned the family house to her, her son lives in Canada, her daughter is married to a Czech living in Switzerland and her husband has a prostate the size of a cucumber. Nearby, a monk dressed in a frock displays his noble profile (...). At the door, a family hangs about. They seem to be discussing something serious in the language of tourists. (...) but, this isn't some old pigsty! This is Central Europe!

[‘Vracím se metrem domů. Ve vagónu zírají rovně před sebe dvojice, které si už všechno řekly. Pár školaček se šťastně dusí nad časopisem Dívka. Dáma se zapudrovanými vráskami směřuje do divadla, na sobě kožich, vrátili barák, syn v Kanadě, dcera provdaná za Čechošvýcara, muž prostatu jako okurku. Opodál vystavuje ušlechtilý profil mnich v kutně (...). U dveří postává rodinka. Vážně před sebou rozmlouvají turistickým jazykem. (...) Jenomže tady, hajzlíku, není holubník! Tady je střední Evropa!’] (KS: 245-246)

But the way he and some of his friends often describe this place is marked with scepticism and disgust:

‘Somehow, all seemed to be colourless, as if it was blacked by smoke. Yet, it was so familiar. (...) [C]rushed polystyrene cups. Ice-lolly wooden-stick leftovers. Matches. Cups. Empty water bottles.’

[‘Všechno to bylo jaksi bezbarvé, jakoby vyuzené, a přesto tak známé (...) zmačkané polystyrénové pohárky. Dřívka od nanuků. Sirky. Kelímky. Flašky od Dobré vody.’] (KS: 135).

It is again the confusion of the unknown and of the new (unexpected) that makes Beneš doubts all he sees in Prague and around it; it is the familiarity of the well-known and the remembered (recognized) that makes him reconciled to the city. Both the opposite feelings generate his story, as well as the city of Prague – a theatrum mundi of his perceptive self – interesting and alive.

Hakl's way of seeing Prague and life within is not exceptional or unique. Similar images of Prague may be found in the literary fiction of other contemporary writers. Václav Kahuda's (b. 1965) story, Technologie dubnového večera (The Technology of an April Evening, 2000), follows two main characters into a 'coal-dusk' ['uhelné šero'] that is 'sprawling across the city' ['vznášelo nad městem'], into the park, Stromovka, which is 'a dark district in the silence and lanterns gloom there in the bushes' ['tmavý okres ticha a lucerny tam svítí v křovinách'] and where 'a small light is burning in the kiosk at the Šlechtovka restaurant' ['v kiosku u Šlechtovy restaurace plane světýlko']. On the way to the pub, both characters observe 'the walls of Bohnice housing estate glowing from behind the river' ['za řekou, v dálce, svítily stěny bohnického sídliště']; they see the chimney of the Holešovice power station, 'the defoliated brick gate' ['opadaná cihlová brána'] and 'the slated roofs of the Cathedral' ['břidlicové střechy katedrály'] which 'arises from the tree overgrowth located behind the Letná plain' ['za Letenskou plání se vynořuje nad hladinou stromů'] (Kahuda 2000: 9-10). All these impressions come from a single text which Kahuda dated as Prague, June 1998. This is a story about Jan Beneš (Hakl's real name) and Petr Kratochvil (Kahuda's real name), specifically about one of the common talks these characters share together on their way through Prague. In Jáchym Topol's (b. 1962) books – Sestra (City Silver Sister, 1994) and Anděl (Angel, 1995) – the image of contemporary Prague is similar; perhaps more negative and extreme in the description of certain places and colours that determine them (blood coloured clouds, a pot hole in the middle of the Anděl crossroads, the smell of urine when passing a synagogue, the metal roller-shutters, hospitals, McDonalds, dodgy pubs, slot-machines, gypsies and junkies in Anděl).

In Hakl's, Kahuda's and Topol's fiction, we see a realistic but multi-dimensional picture of life in Prague. The Prague buildings, its quarters, streets, pubs, notices and shops create the scenery for people's actions here, and people bring life into the these walls, giving them enough attention and space so that they become also the active participants of the present world. In the works of all three writers, the city is something one can really see (images), hear (voices, TV, radio), feel (atmosphere) and touch (things). It is a city of 'real' things – if we consider the 'real' to represent the 'authentic' rather than the imagined (with the exception of Beneš's anticipated visions on the decline of Czech society).

The attention to the city and an interest in ordinary things that inhabit the city has been a key characteristic of various literary groups since the introduction of realism and authenticity in literature. In 1945–1948, Skupina 42 (Group 42)⁵² wrote poetry which dealt with the 'real' life in the city – the city as a place of raw and civilised but a multi-layered and sprawling reality –, and with the life of ordinary human beings living and working within its walls.

'The reality of the modern artist and the modern poet is practically the city: its inhabitants, its pavements, its lamp-posts, its shop notices, its buildings, its staircases and its flats. (...) Should art re-gain its lost meaning in an individual's life, it has to return its attention to things amongst which and with which [Man] lives. (...) Art discovers the real, it creates the real; art reveals the real, i.e. that world that we live in and we who live within it. Nothing else but the everyday, horrifying and glorious drama of humanity and the real world, a drama of the enigma facing the miracle is the theme, the meaning and the intention of art.'

[‘Skutečností moderního malíře a básníka je prakticky město; jeho lidé, jeho dláždění, stojany jeho lamp, návěští jeho krámů, jeho domy, schodiště, byty. (...) Má-li umění nabýti ztraceného významu v životě jednotlivcově, musí se vrátit k věcem, mezi nimiž a s nimiž [člověk] žije. (...) Umění objevuje skutečnost, vytváří skutečnost, odhaluje skutečnost, ten svět, v němž žijeme, a nás, kteří žijeme. Neboť nejen tématem, ale smyslem a záměrem umění není nic než každodenní, úděsné a slavné drama člověka a skutečnosti: drama záhady čelící zázraku.’] (Chalupecký 1940: 88-89)

Skupina 42⁵³ sees reality in motion and in fragments rather than as a static and complex unit of creation. Its contribution to the world of writing lies in portraying human banality as well as in creating an image of human life, an individual’s everyday reality and an individual’s predicament. The literary work which Skupina 42 produced was not particularly lyrical; it was, rather, a non-literary record of reality which saw the present as a myth of the contemporary world.

The poetics, style and themes of Skupina 42 have had a large impact on that strand of Czech literature that includes works by authors such as Egon Bondy (1930–2007), Bohumil Hrabal (1914–1997) and, later, the literature of the Czech underground movement of the 1970s and 1980s.⁵⁴ Furthermore, Skupina 42 was an important source of inspiration for the work of all three above-mentioned writers, Hakl, Kahuda and Topol. These writers have also become interested in the lives of ordinary people living on the periphery of society. They have also assumed a critical attitude to officialdom.

Nevertheless, there is another source of inspiration which may be discovered when reading the works by the three above-mentioned Czech writers. Hakl, Kahuda and Topol follow not just the line of realistic authenticity, but also the line of human fantasy and myth to construct an image of current life, Prague included. Hakl uses elements of magic realism, fantasy and sci-fi (the Emauzy monastery looking like ‘a snake’s teeth’, the reference to Verne’s Steel Town, to a man in a space suit, to Shub-Niggurath). In Konec světa, the inspiration by a fantasy-based literary style becomes the most appealing when Beneš speaks about his dreams, about his day visions of Prague, about his thoughts regarding how the self is being trapped within the system and, finally, about his contemplations of the world which balances on the verge of the chaotic present and an apocalyptic future.

⁵⁴ See also: PILAŘ, Martin (1999): Underground (Kapitoly o českém literárním undergroundu). Brno: Host.

From all the above notes, it follows that Hakl is using the elements of both realistic fiction and fantastic fiction to construct his fictive world. By doing so, he contributes to the creation of a new, postmodern mythology of the postmodern city of Prague. In Hakl's work (and also in the work of Kahuda and Topol), Prague is a multi-layered, multi-dimensional, ambiguous place where interesting things are happening if a person wants to see them happening, and if this person imagines and lives.

4.3 'Re-telling': in the centre of pub talks and random encounters

A large part of Beneš's contemporary world is filled with various stories he has had a chance to experience or he has heard from other people. Individuals' stories approach him whenever he lets them do so: on TV and radio, in dreams, in various flats, on the streets and, most commonly, in pubs. He tells us everything he can see or hear around him. When walking in the streets or sitting in a pub, he describes all kinds of things he manages to notice and live through; the buildings, the signs, the noise, the fragmented dialogues and the people whom he encounters. For to him, everything and everyone has its own story to say, no matter how confusing the message is. It is especially the pub which becomes one of the main sites of Beneš's narrations.

Within the context of Czech culture, the pub has always been a public place which has played an important part in communication. People have gone to pubs to express their ideas and to share their own personal difficulties and breakdowns. According to Vladimír Macura, in the first half of the nineteenth century, the pub environment played a crucial role 'in the socialization of the national culture project' ['v socializaci vlasteneckého kulturního projektu'] (Macura 1997: 65). The pub was a place where people could choose whatever language they would like to speak; a place where people could express their national ideas; a place where Czech intellectuals could lead discussions with the bourgeois, with the artists as well as with the ordinary town folk about their shared problems. However, the pub has always also been the place of (un)controllable beer drinking and of human decline. In the light of such an ambiguity, the attitude to the pub has constantly been changing. In the second half of the nineteenth century, the pub was regarded as a place of alcoholism and of human destruction. 'Bohemia has often been seen as a country where all activity eventually dissolves hopelessly in beer.' ['Obvyklým tématem je reflexe Čech jako země, kde se aktivita beznadějně rozpustila v pívu.'] (Ibid: 69) The pub is a place where action ends in passivity – due to beer drinking.

In the twentieth century, the pub continued to be a place of political and cultural discussions, and also a place of desperate escapism to alcohol. It has been a place of encounters and of forgetting; a place of much talk and little activity. Hakl's Konec světa fits this image of the pub. His Jan Beneš is a regular visitor of local pubs in Prague. He speaks with his friends in pubs whenever he feels frustrated by the world of work and when he feels lonely. In pubs, he hears his friends' personal life stories and witnesses their breakdowns. He sits and quietly observes what is happening around him. The pub is a place where extraordinary things may happen when no one really expects them (for instance, a dancing performance by two ageing barmaids to amuse the local barflies; Beneš exchanges slaps with his colleague's girlfriend, or he exchanges a long kiss with a local floozy). It is in the pub where serious talk blends in with background noise (a murderer's testimony is heard at one point against the background of normal pub noise). It is in the pub that a person's weaknesses are revealed. (This is where we learn that Beneš is unable to approach an attractive woman, that Fáfa is unable to stay reasonably calm and often runs crazy and that local barflies are unable to fully enjoy the barmaids' striptease show).

In Beneš's world, the contemporary pub is a place where one feels at home, safe and never alone. It is especially a place of a sharing (conversations), of uncontrolled behaviour (wild drinking nights) and of unpretentious silence (quiet observation). It is never a place for important political discussions, at least not at the present time. The time for political debate has already passed, as narrating Beneš argues when talking about the life of one of his acquaintances – the waiter, Igor. For Beneš, the pub had political significance previously in the text where he talks about his friend, Igor the waiter, but only because in the past, 'Igor's pub' was frequented by people who were interested in music, in books and in events which were suppressed by official communist propaganda. Igor's pub used to be visited by people who exchanged their works of arts there, after closing time and behind locked doors. Now, Beneš's pubs are not even places where people go to show off. They are places where everyone tends to be equal but unique, as unique as their characters and their stories are. At least Beneš perceives them as such.

The pubs where Beneš spends his time are ordinary places. They are interesting because of their atmosphere, not because of their ranking, their prices or the quality of food. These are mostly cheap pubs or shabby garden kiosks (Žižkov is full of such places):

‘U Pšenice is an ordinary communal pub located down there in the Vršovice borough. Only a few guests were sitting inside. Some youngsters were having a game of pool at the bar situated at the rear of the pub.’

[‘U Pšenice je obyčejná občanská hospoda dole ve Vršovicích. Sedělo tam pár hostů, vzadu v lokále šťouchala mládež biliár.’] (KS: 6)

‘Behind the Radlice footbridge, (...) there is the restaurant, U modré hvězdy. Nowadays, it is an ordinary pub which differs in no way from hundreds of thousands of similar places. Yet, still at the beginning of the 1990s, a person who poked his nose in could not miss the atmosphere that dominated the place... It was an exceptionally silent place. Different from other pubs. (...) You see, the majority of the guests had spent ten, fifteen years in prison. Various plotters, liars and dodgers were sitting there and then, separately from the aristocrats – discreet men in their fifties with blue-coloured chubby circles under their eyes.’

[‘Za radlickou lávkou... stojí restaurace U modré hvězdy. Dneska už je to běžná hospoda, která se ničím neliší od statisíců podobných pajzlů. Ale ještě začátkem devadesátých let si každý, kdo tam strčil nos, nemohl nevšimnout té atmosféry... Panovalo tam zvláštní ticho. Jiné než v ostatních hospodách. (...) Většina štamgastů totiž měla odkroucená tak deset patnáct roků. Vysedávali tu různí kšeftaři, lháři, uhejbáci a stranou od nich šlechta: rozvážní padesátníci s inkoustovým tukem pod okem.’] (KS: 169)

Nevertheless, they are also the places full of memories of the past communist times:

‘A new, kind and familiar empty world opened up to me. I went to work. I spent my time with friends in pubs. I visited the musty catacombs under the former Stalin Monument. They smelled of old concrete. Beer was on tap there. Bands performed there and some customers danced in the stirring dust. Others watched them from the tables, still others wandered along the underground corridors, all euphoric and with lighters on in their hands. (...) These were the corridors where, for many decades, only the heavy-stone steps of the Czechoslovak people resounded.’

[‘Otevřel se přede mnou nový, vlídný, důvěrně známý prázdný svět. Chodil jsem do práce, s kamarády do hospod, navštěvoval jsem zatuchlé, starou maltou vonící katakomby pod bývalým Stalinovým pomníkem. Točilo se tam tenkrát pivo, na pódiu se střídaly kapely, někteří návštěvníci trsali v rozvířeném prachu, jiní je od stolu pozorovali a ještě jiní bloudili v povzneseném stavu podzemními chodbami s plápolajícími zapalovači v ruce. (...) Chodbami, kterými se léta a léta rozléhaly jenom kamenné kroky československého lidu.’] (KS: 18)

Every pub which Beneš visits has its own peculiar atmosphere; every person he meets has his/her own place within the pub; every person he picks up from the crowd has his/her own unchangeable character. It could be a friend, a woman or just a random person. Only once does he go to a pub with his boss and with his workmates but this does not seem to bring him any pleasure at all. The very next day, when they all sober up and meet at work, the boss acts as if the previous night had never happened. From now on, he is again the boss who does whatever suits his position best, regardless of others (KS: 179-246).

In Beneš's pubs, there is hardly any place for bosses, for work and for hierarchy and pretence. It is an open environment where everyone feels equal: the regular barflies, the junkies, the loonies, the criminals, the aristocrats, the businessmen, the artists, the teenagers and just ordinary people of every age. It is the place where everyone can talk about whatever they want or just sit quietly and observe. And people do talk there, and Beneš does listen to them. And many things he hears he marks down: vivid dialogues, intensive monologues, fragmented discussions and the noises. His pub is a place of sharing and that is the main reason why also Beneš goes there – to enjoy the company of others (he does so as one of their regular visitors) and to learn about the nature of their human selves (he does so as the narrating self). Beneš's pub is not a place where people come to protest against the regime or to support it. It is not even a place where people get seriously drunk, although occasionally his pubs can get very busy and wild. Beneš's pub is a shelter for those people who feel lonely and lost in the world. It is also a place of entertainment and fun. Beneš's pub is its own universe.

The pub is not the only place where Beneš learns about people's personal lives. No less important are his walks across the streets of Prague and his occasional travels to the Czech countryside. These 'trips' also bring him desired satisfaction and relief. They inspire him, give him various impulses and various stories to hear and then re-tell. And he does re-tell them, retaining the complexity of all the images and sounds.

4.4 'Being': in the flat

The city, the streets and the pubs are the places where Beneš goes whenever he feels lonely and isolated. On the other hand, whenever he feels overburdened and overwhelmed by others, he shuts himself up in the seclusion of his flat. The pub is, for him, a representation of his extrovert self; his need to be open to new impulses. The flat is, for him, a representation of his introvert self; his necessity to dedicate himself only to his own being, to his thoughts, dreams and imaginations, and to his writing. As the flat is a place of his own inner depth and the only safety he feels, he is very careful about who is allowed to enter. In the majority of cases, he meets people outside. Those who are always permitted to come in are his closest friends (his friend Pavlik) and his girlfriends (Řípa, Petruše).

The flat is a representation of Beneš's natural and unpretentious self. There, he can do anything he wants. There, he does not have to care about his masculine image. He can be completely relaxed and free of any mask if he is on his own:

‘One evening, I was wandering about the flat only in my boxer shorts. I was listening to MTV and was getting ready to go to bed.’

[‘Jednou večer jsem bloumal po bytě v trenýrkách, poslouchal MTV a chystal se jít spát.’] (KS: 20)

‘I just wanted to walk along cobblestones, to the newsagent’s round the corner every morning, to buy fags and a newspaper and then simply go straight home again. And so I did this everyday.’

[‘Chtělo se mi jen každé ráno jít po kočičích hlavách za roh do trafiky, koupit cigára a noviny a jít zase pěkně rovnou domů. A tak jsem to tak dělal.’] (KS: 225)

The flat is his sanctuary. It is the place that belongs to him only. It is well hidden. Once the flat becomes occupied by other people (the Danish and French foreigners, Beneš’s partners), it loses its spiritual dimension and becomes an alien place. Once the other people are gone, the flat regains its palliative qualities:

‘As soon as the door closed, I lay down on the sofa and gazed up at the ceiling for a long time. I knew that ceiling well. A new, kind and familiar world opened up before me. The old times came back for a while, when the radio played in the kitchen and a lid bobbed up on a cooking pot on the stove.’

[‘Když zaklaply dveře, lehl jsem si na kanape a dlouho se díval do stropu. Znal jsem ten strop dobře. Otevřel se přede mnou nový, vlídný, důvěrně známý svět. Zase se na chvíli vrátil ten starý čas, kdy v kuchyni hrálo rádio a na plotně nadskakovala poklička.’] (KS: 25-26)

For Beneš, the pub is a place for sharing, for enjoyment and for escape from responsibility and from loneliness. The flat hides him from the outside world. It calms him down, it inspires him but it also constrains him. Beneš goes home to seek protection and peace from the outside world in his flat. He goes to the pub to seek the company of others. He leaves home because he cannot stand being alone with only his own thoughts. He leaves the outside world because he is depressed by the behaviour of other people, whom he regards as too dysfunctional, ignorant or hypocritical:

‘I did not want to go home yet. Because, if possible, a person should go home only if he is free of all emotional images and all emotional experience. Otherwise, these experiences will stay with him in the flat longer than this person wants to, he will not like them then.’

[‘Domů se mi ještě nechtělo, protože domů má člověk chodit pokud možno oproštěn od jakýchkoliv emocemi zatížených zážitků a představ. Jinak tam s ním ty zážitky zůstanou v podnájmu vždycky o něco déle, než aby se mu pak ještě mohly líbit.’] (KS: 9-10)

Beneš is an eternal seeker of both his own inner self and of the outside world but he continually keeps escaping from both.

4.5 Apocalyptic visions of the world

It is his negative attitude to the contemporary world that makes Beneš escape and hide in his flat or in the Czech countryside, or escape from his inner self and hide in a pub or in another public space. Negative thoughts enter his mind whenever he feels touched by a strong emotional experience. This can be an encounter with a particularly vulnerable individual, a painful sexual experience, stressful work, a 'date' with a bottle of schnapps, a brutal programme on TV or a chaotic dream. Whenever Beneš falls into one of these traps, he loses control over his mind. When this happens, he detaches himself from his physical self and observes whatever is happening in front of him and within him from a distance. Then he comments on it, as if he was an omniscient observer and an omniscient narrator.

The picture which Beneš sees in the moments of his personal crisis is quite horrendous. It is a picture of confusion, fear and ignorance. It is a vision of the world in which individuals do not care about anything in life; they do not care about others or their own selves. It is a picture of the world which is trapped between struggle and survival; the world of destruction and of no hope; the world of inhuman forms and no feelings. It is an approaching apocalypse, the 'end of the world' and bitter demise of society.

One of the most appalling and the most expressive visions appears in Beneš's mind when he describes his sexual experience with the ageing ballet dancer when collapsing onto her scarred, desperate body:

'The city creaked, wobbled and floated along the Earth's surface, on and on. No one really knew why they were alive. Pubs were full of shining noggins, and laborious jokes resounded into space. Red-hot missiles of the 'shoot and forget' kind incessantly flew above the cooling musk of the human spirit.'

['Město skřípalo, kymácelo se a plulo po zemském povrchu dál a dál. Nikdo pořádně nevěděl, proč žije. V hospodách zářily panáky s kořalkou a sršely upoceně vtípky. Nad vychládající kaší ducha bez přestání létaly rozžhavené střely typu 'vystřel a zapomeň'.'] (KS: 82)

What appears in his mind at the moment of climax is not a woman but a repugnant vision of a stagnant society which is in a perpetual 'contradictory' motion; a society which has ceased to evolve and, instead, is now oblivious to its ignorant hedonism. It is not just Czech society he talks about here; it is human society in general which, Beneš fears, is threatened by a descent into apathy towards the individual and, therefore, towards society as a whole. To drive this point home, he uses the figure of a random man who observes a sex act from start to finish with a blank expression. Beneš uses this device to mirror his own detachment from his own act of copulation and from the misery of the whole scene: ‘red-hot missiles of the “shoot and forget” kind’ [‘rozžhavené střely typu „vystřel a zapomeň“’] (KS: 82).

As Beneš’s imagination goes further, the same vision, which originally emerged from the sex act with the ageing lady, expands into many directions and creates a string of other pictures that, in the end, lead to his thoughts about the cruelty of human behaviour and, finally, about the anticipated ‘end of the world’:

‘Guys tormented their dolls with their incomprehensible silence. The dolls tormented their guys with their irrational reproaches. The nursery children already knew exactly how to be hellish to each other. No one seemed to know what the following day might bring. Everybody was scared to think about it, though everybody could not stop themselves from thinking about it. This created a special tension; that was the best thing one could ask for. Everyone supposed that this was not the end of the world because the end of the world surely did not look like this. They knew from the movies what it should look like. Some people fantasized that life could be organised differently, if there was a will, (...) but they were also mistaken. No one could grasp the basic eternal idea that the world could not possibly end for everybody at the same moment, for each individual’s death is unique. Because reality is nothing more than a collection of wishes and hopes. The end of the world is a purely personal category. What one person sees as the end is for another a good opportunity to open a bottle and to enjoy the exhilarating feeling that now is the best time of his life.’

[‘Chlapi týrali ženské nepochopitelným mlčením. Ženské trápily chlapy iracionálními výčitkami. Už děti ve školce přesně věděly, jak si navzájem vyrobit to nejhorší peklo. Nikdo neměl zdání, co ho čeká příští den. Všichni se na to báli myslet, a všichni na to museli myslet. Tím vznikalo zvláštní povrchové napětí; to na tom bylo to nejlepší. Všichni věřili, že toto ještě není konec světa, protože takhle konec světa přece nevypadá. Jak může vypadat, to znali z kina. Někteří tušili, že by to při troše fantazie mohlo možná být i jinak... jenže i ti se mýlili. Všem napořád unikala základní věčná úvaha, že svět dobře nemůže skončit pro všechny najednou, jedině pro každého zvlášť. Protože skutečnost není nic jiného než soubor přání a nadějí. Konec světa je čistě osobní kategorie. Co se jednomu jeví jako konec, v tom si jiný s radostí otevře flašku a má přesný pocit, že teprve teď je to ono.’] (KS: 82).

It is the desperation Beneš sees in the woman’s desire to expose her scarred body and his own feeling of inadequacy to deal with the situation compassionately that triggers his catastrophic thoughts about social cruelty and social ignorance. He leaves the woman exposed to nature and retreats into his own world. Beneš’s apocalyptic vision is nothing less than an expression of his own desperate feeling which further shatters the already shattered world. All hope recedes into the distance.

Beneš's critical view of himself and of Czech society can be discerned throughout the whole text of Konec světa. It is directed against the system, the inhuman mass society which turns each individual who condones the situation into a servant, a machine. It is also directed against every individual who collapses in his/her effort to fight the apocalyptic vision. To express his concerns about the human decline, Beneš uses various metaphors and other devices which come from the world of his experience or which he imagines. The following vision seems to be boosted by his experience of contemporary Western film and literary sci-fi and fantasy production and highlighted by his momentary alcoholic intoxication:

‘Something was going on. But I didn’t have a clue what it was. Suddenly, I could feel the Earth plates moving underneath my feet, slightly. I could feel how they chafed against each other and how lengthily they creaked, almost soundlessly. (...) I saw so much candy floss which would cause toothache to a large number of nations. I saw enormous, large and empty bags of time, which could never be filled up with anything else but talk. Shoals of words were running through the screen of my memory. They were swelling like sealant foam and stuffed up my skull from the inside. (...) The sun was rolling across the horizon. It jumped over the hills as if it was a fireball. It was flying around the Earth with a diabolical speed. The Earth was smiling like a corpse which had been stored in ice. (...) Shattered relationships were moving about the fragile bones of seconds. (...) The ocean was swelling and phantasmagorical creatures the human eye would never see were floating in its depths. Their movement was jerky. Livid undersea bombers were running through the inky waters and luminous hippocampuses jumped up and down in the space between the sea corals as if they were majorettes. (...) I was sitting in a needlessly large, feckless robotic body, surrounded by bubbling fluid, spattering nerve endings, creaking bones, grouching pancreas, beating pumps, dry-crowing lungs and various rattling defective aggregates which were all unnecessarily complicated. (...) I was encircled by terrific, chaotically scuttling forms. It is not within human power to describe everything, but still there is an odd possibility to look down into that bottomless, sparkling hole, into a Macocha cave⁵⁵ of the collective mind whose bottom hides the slowly beating heart, the single heart that belongs to all of us. We call this heart “habit”...’

[‘Něco se dělo. Ale vůbec jsem nevěděl, co. Najednou jsem ucítil, jak se pod mnou zlehka posouvají zemské kry, jak se o sebe třou a jak táhle, sotva slyšitelně skřípou. (...) Spatřil jsem lány cukrové vaty, ze které by rozbolely zuby celé národy. Uviděl jsem obrovské prázdné futrály času, které nikdy nikdo nenaplní ničím jiným než řečmi. Sítím paměti proplouvala hejna slov, která se na druhé straně nafukovala jako těsnící pěna a ucpávala mi zevnitř lebku. (...) Slunce se kutálelo po obzoru, skákalo po kopcích jako kulový blesk, lítalo kolem Země pekelnou rychlostí. Země se usmívala jako mrtvola v ledu. (...) V křehkých kostech vteřin se přesýpaly střepy vztahů. (...) Oceán se vzdouval a v hlubinách trhaně pluli přízrační, lidským okem nikdy nespátření tvorové. Inkoustovými vodami proplouly sinálé podmořské bombardéry a světélkující mořští koníci hopkali mezi korály jako mažoretky. (...) Seděl jsem v nadbytečně velkém, nešikovném stroji těla, obklopen bublajícími tekutinami, prskáním nervových spojů, vrzáním kostí, hudebním slinivky, tlukotem pump a čerpadel, suchým kokrháním plic a drnčením různých zbytečně složitých, poruchových agregátů. (...) Kolem dokola se nacházelo strašlivé rejdiště forem. Není v lidských silách popsat všechno, ale je možné tu a tam nahlédnout do té bezedné, jiskřící jámy, do Macochy kolektivní mysli, na jejímž dně pomalu buší společné srdce nás všech, a to srdce se jmenuje „zvyk“...’] (KS: 215-216).

In this vision, Beneš describes the Earth already falling, oceans already swelling, time already losing its sense and the sun already burning the ground and destroying all alive; he sees shattered relationships, freezing smiles, phantasmagorical creatures and close-up pictures of vital human organs. In this vision, Beneš describes himself as a man sitting amongst all these earthly forms, trapped in a robotic body of his own habit and his own inability to escape from this habit. He describes himself at the moment of his idle existence and yet he laughs at himself, in a sad and a sarcastic way. He laughs at the society which the man in the robotic body represents. It is a society of inhuman forms and not human beings – society on the verge of its own downfall. That is how Beneš sees the contemporary world and his position within its structures.

4.6 ‘The end of the world’: the legacy of the postmodern and the apocalypse

The apocalyptic visions of the world, self-reflection, anti-elitism, the rejection of existing practices in Czech post-communist society, escape to the countryside or to the world of different realities – to dreams, literature and films, an interest in myths (Shub-Niggurath) and literature (Rousseau’s Candide in ‘Zlaté časy’: KS, Jules Verne), strongly expressed eroticism, the existence of labyrinths and mirrors, and a grotesque perception of the world – these are some of the elements of Hakl’s Konec světa. These are also some of the elements which some contemporary literary theoreticians classify as some of the characteristics of a ‘postmodern’ style of writing. Umberto Eco⁵⁶ and some other critics see these features as characteristics of the literary style by ‘apocalyptic’ writers and by ‘non-integrated’ writers. Can Emil Hakl be also considered as an author of postmodern fiction?

Can he be seen as an ‘apocalyptic’ and a ‘non-integrated writer’? In order to answer these questions we need to include a brief discussion here of what the concepts of the ‘postmodern’, the ‘apocalyptic’ and the ‘non-integrated’ means.

According to Connor, the postmodern concept of seeing things appears in the second half of the 20th century as a reaction to the ‘important changes [that have] taken place in politics, economics and social life; changes that could broadly be characterized by the two words, delegitimation and dedifferentiation’ (Connor 2008: 3). In his view, postmodernism is a reaction to the world in which the differences between centres and margins, between classes, regions and cultural levels are being ‘eroded or compiled’ (Ibid: 3). Postmodernism is believed to mark the destruction of all universal meta-narratives and their truths and to observe, instead, increasing voices from the margins and therefore the increasing diversity and plurality of cultures and their individual testimonies (Storey 2001: 150). Postmodernism reflects upon the world in which ‘the real and the imaginary continually collapse into each other’ and in which the ‘reality and simulation are experienced as without difference’ (Ibid: 153). Furthermore, postmodernism is ‘a culture production born out of previous cultural production’. It ‘experiences time not as a continuum (past-present-future), but as a perpetual present which is only occasionally marked by the intrusion of the past or the possibility of a future’ (Ibid: 159). It pronounces identity crises, ‘the end of man’ and the birth of the new but plural identity of the self; and so it plays with the idea of the ‘end of the real’ and the birth of the new hyper-real (virtual real).

The text of Hakl’s Konec světa is a testimony about one man, about Jan Beneš, whose existence is continuously on the move between places and different spheres. He is a character and so he is a representative of the reality he lives. But he is also the narrator of the text and therefore a representative of the meta-real (or the hyper-real). His ‘real’ self lives at the time which corresponds to the time of the fall of communism and to the time of the introduction of a new capitalist (and consumerist) lifestyle in Central Europe. He struggles to cope with these. He is alone or with others, with loonies or with ordinary people, with the unemployed, with the employed or with businessmen. He tries to find a place in his life for all of them or just for himself. Jan Beneš’s ‘meta-real’ self dwells in the world of narrations (or representations). He is mostly subjective but sometimes he lends his voice to another person (in the case of Beneš’s friend, Lád’a, in ‘Lád’ovo poslední tango’). The narrating ‘I’ lives in the present (as ‘I’ is also the character of the story) but his narration involves all time planes – the vibrant present, memories of the past and thoughts and visions of the approaching future. It inter-mixes observations and impressions, descriptions of places and visions, dreams, films and literary texts. Jan Beneš as both the acting and the narrating 'I' is constantly dubious about the world and his own place within it. He characterizes himself but he does it in the way he thinks other people would see him. He is constantly constructing and deconstructing himself. He talks about the world but he never approves or disapproves of what is happening around him. He lives 'the real' but speaks of his perception of 'the real' and of everything the 'real' represents for him. He is situated amongst the narratives of the world and so he narrates them.

Konec světa shows a world in which the truth is constructed from the narrator's perception of reality and the stories this reality brings; it is a world of variety of individuals' stories; it is a world in which people suffer an identity crisis; it is a world of the constant reconstruction of the narrating self; it is a world where the multidimensional and the perpetual present is created by constant blending of the 'real' and the 'hyper-real' (created by media, film, TV, PC games); it is a world of 'real' pictures and surreal, often apocalyptic images of the human life. Can Konec světa, then, be seen as a postmodern text? In addition and once again, can Emil Hakl be seen as an author of a postmodern 'apocalypse' or an author of the post-modern 'integration'?

Vladimír Novotný attempts to analyze contemporary Czech literature with reference to Umberto Eco's thesis from 1964. In Apocalypse Postponed, Umberto Eco describes two kinds of writers: 'sceptics' ('apocalyptic'), who defend themselves from any phenomenon connected to mass culture, and the 'integrated' ('comforters'), who, on the contrary, associate with the theories and practices of mass culture production. Using Eco's theory, Novotný (Novotný 2002: 38-40) talks about two main groups of Czech contemporary writers. Into the first group of the 'integrated' he places those authors who signed up for the codified family of mid-culture genres in the 1990s⁵⁷, e. g. for mass production of professionally written bestsellers, new conventional narrative fiction, a post-modern polemic with postmodernism, socio-journalism, political tabloid-novel production, popular feminist writing, a didactically-catholic version of the 'Bildungsroman' and academically theorizing fiction. On the other hand, in his view, the 'apocalyptic' create an apocalyptic image of human micro-/macrocosm.⁵⁸ Some of their works grow under the influence of magic realism; others go back to classical existentialism. Some writers create a negative vision of society; others create a documentary record of human authenticity or build a new genre of the postmodern grotesque. Whilst the literature of the 'integrated' is, according to Novotný (based on Eco's theory), a 'sophisticated entertainment for lavishly spent leisure' ['sofistikovaná zábava pro marnotratně prožívaný volný čas'] (Ibid: 40), the literature of the 'apocalypitics' reflects a plurality of styles and thoughts; whilst the 'integrated' create a new literary tradition of the 'integrated' (mid-cult) world, the 'apocalypitics' use their right to pronounce disagreement with the current world (Ibid: 34-42).

Considering all the aspects that Novotný (based on Eco's theory) suggested in relation to mid-cult literature and in relation to the postmodern, and taking into account the theories that define the postmodern, it can be said about Hakl's Konec světa that this fiction carries elements of both. This work is 'apocalyptic' as it is about a person's doubting individuality, about an individual's constant reconstruction of the self and the society, and about thoughts regarding 'the end of the world'. However, it is also 'integrated' because it is about the individual's effort for the acceptance of the current world. Konec světa is 'apocalyptic' as it is built on the variety of different stories, on the inter-mixing of the 'real' and 'surreal' images of the world and on the narrator's effort to provide an authentic picture of all that this reality offers. It is 'integrated' as it flows along the life of a single character and along his unprecedented observations of the world he sees around him, and along his perception of the variety of different stories. It is 'apocalyptic' as it constructs a grotesque picture of the contemporary society on the verge of the apocalypse (in character's visions and dreams).

To answer all the above questions, it is possible to say that Emil Hakl is the author of a postmodern text and so the author of an apocalyptic and multi-dimensional image of the current world. Hence, he is also the author of 'integration' as his work is a part of the tradition of socio-realistic literature; that kind of literature which represents the world of ordinary people living their chaotic lives in post-communist Czech society and which comments on the image it has constructed.

5. 'Life according to Jan Beneš' - continued: the context of Hakl's fiction

Konec světa was Hakl's first attempt at fiction. Since then, he has published several other volumes of prose: the novel Intimní schránka Sabriny Black (Sabrina Black's Intimate Mailbox 2002, the final cut 2010), the novella O rodičích a dětech (Of Kids and Parents 2002), the collection of short stories O létajících objektech (On Flying Objects 2004), the novel Let čarodějnice (Flight of the Witch 2008), three single stories collected in Pravidla směšného chování (The Rules of Ridiculous Behaviour 2010), the novel Skutečná událost (The Real Thing 2013) and, most recently, the collection of short stories Hovězí kostky (Beef Cubes 2014). It is the aim of this brief discussion of Hakl's later fiction to ascertain whether the reality of Hakl's writing has changed with the passing of time and if so, what impact this change has on our perception of Hakl's fictive reality in relation to the contemporary world. It is important to note that this chapter does not involve the last two works by Hakl as these works were published outwith the time scale designated for this thesis (the year 2012).

5.1 Intimní schránka Sabriny Black: the history of one love, the history of one career

The main character and at the same time the narrating 'I' of the novel Intimní schránka Sabriny Black (henceforth Sabrina Black or SB) is again Honza Beneš, though now he calls himself Hanz (and Honst). Hanz lives in Prague. If he has a job, it is work for an advertising agency, for a magazine or he tries to run his own business. Similarly to his counterpart in Konec světa, he experiences a very unstable life when in work and out of work, in a sexual relationship and out of a sexual relationship, in a friendship and out of a friendship. He struggles with existence on the margins of mainstream society after losing his ability to cope with the chaotic world of business. He suffers from a broken relationship with a woman he loves and from a broken friendship with men he thought were his friends. He struggles with life within the official structures after joining a company of young, materialistic professionals. In disagreement with the lifestyle of mainstream society and with his own frustration with it, he often locks himself in his flat or hides in pubs. In his flat, he enjoys the solitude of his own self; in pubs, he enjoys both his own company and the company of local barflies and the people who share the same experience of having an unstable, chaotic mind. He drinks, smokes, quietly observes the world around him and absorbs everything that surrounds him – pub talk, sounds, pictures, various slogans, television programmes and dreams. All of them are important for his world; all form part of his fictive reality.

In comparison with Konec světa, which explores all the above topics, the novel Sabrina Black concentrates specifically on two main themes: one is Beneš's experience with the running of a private advertisement agency, the second, and maybe more focused here, is his relationship with Petruše and the withdrawal symptoms he suffers after losing her. What was only glanced at in the previous volume (there was a short remark that Beneš had a share in a company; there was a brief reference to how wild his life with Petruše was) is used here in detail to create a complex picture of Beneš's world and all it embraces. In Sabrina Black, Beneš reveals various personal details that are a part of both his working life and his private relationship.

Accordingly, the narrative of Sabrina Black and also the structure of the book are slightly different from the structure of Hanz's Konec světa – it is a novel, it is also more linear and less fragmented. The story begins when Beneš accepts employment in an advertising agency and it goes on to describe his attempts to set up a private business and his failure to make it profitable. The novel then follows Hanz's unemployment, his unsuccessful attempts to work for another advertising agency, a long break when he writes a literary text, and it ends up announcing that Hanz was offered an editor's position on staff of the literary magazine Tvar. A certain linearity can also be found in Hanz's testimony of his relationship with Petruše. It begins with a description of their mutual understanding and love; it continues with several arguments and break-ups and ends with separation and with his depression over Petruše's disappearance from his life.

There are similarities between Jan Beneš, the narrating character of Konec světa, and Hanz, the narrating character of Intimní schránka Sabriny Black. There are also similarities between both of these characters and the writer himself. In Sabrina Black, though, the resemblance of the two worlds, the fictive world and the real world, is manifested with even more details. Hanz is a German version of the name Jan (as we know, the real first name of Emil Hakl). Hanz's great-aunt, whom he mentions on one occasion, has the writer's surname, Benešová (the male form of this name is Beneš). Both Emil Hakl and Hanz live in Prague. Hanz talks about visiting the really existing Club 8 (Klub 8 – a club frequented by people with literary ambitions). Both Emil Hakl and Hanz have worked in various places including the Libeň Waterworks, the university library, an advertising agency and the literary magazine, Tvar. Both write. What is more, Hanz talks about certain people who exist in the real world, for example the actor Radovan Lukavský (1919–2008), Karel Gott (singer, b. 1939), Petr Zelenka (film director and playwright, b. 1967), Petr Kratochvíl (pseudonym of Václav Kahuda, writer, b. 1965), Mejla Hlavsa (singer and musician from The Plastic People of the Universe music band, 1951–2001), Magor (Ivan Martin Jirous, poet, a representative of the Czech underground, 1944–2011) and Jim Čert (František Horáček, singer, b. 1956).

Not only the main character of both literary texts but also Czech society described in both of these texts appears to have been constructed on the same basis as Hanzl's own experience of life under the communist regime in Czechoslovakia of the 1970s and 1980s, on the basis of his experience of the breakdown of the communist system in 1989 and of the capitalist takeover and the chaotic times thereafter. Konec světa describes a broken society; a society full of people who do not know what to do with their lives after the fall of the previous political regime and after the arrival of the 'new' and so they struggle. The work shows a whole range of people – the enthusiastic and ambitious (perhaps also naïve) youths on the one hand, the lost and depressed young people trying to find the reason for their existence on the other; the assertive sharpshooters and business owners, the servile and pretentious employees as well as various middle-aged individuals lost in the chaos of the post-communist society, who find themselves unable to cope with the present. There are some people who somehow manage to find a way through life without losing their own identity, but these are only few and they often build their lives on the margins of society, living in isolation in the countryside, far from the prosperous civilization. Czech society reflected in Sabrina Black is very similar to the society known to the reader from Konec světa. It is also crowded with all the above mentioned categories of people. Nevertheless, the only story truly explored within the narrative of Sabrina Black is the story of narrating Jan Beneš.

In the view of this thesis, Sabrina Black is a continuation of the 'life according to Jan Beneš'. It is constructed on the basis of the same reality and yet it does not bring anything significantly new to our perception of Hanzl's literary world apart from more details of Beneš's private life.

5.2 O rodičích a dětech: Father and his son, son and his Father

In 2002, Hanzl published the novella, O rodičích a dětech (Of Kids and Parents, henceforth ORD). Similarly to both previous texts, this novella has Jan (Honza) Beneš as the main narrating character. On the other hand, the structure of its narrative is again slightly different. This time it is constructed as a single dialogue – a dialogue between a son and his father.

The story presented in O rodičích a dětech starts when the forty-two-year old son and the narrating ‘I’ of the text comes to visit his seventy-one-year-old father who works as a tour guide in the Prague ZOO, and takes him for a walk via several Prague pubs. The narrative is built up from variations on serious themes (racism, family history and the war) as well as humorous themes (food, the broken washing machine, poems, sex), and from comments of each of the two characters on the surrounding world. The conversation grows from the characters’ need to communicate everything, all the past and the present, and all that has been experienced and observed in one single moment. The dialogue contains complete stories as well as only narrative fragments. Some stories are told once and in full, others are scattered throughout the narrative. Topics such as food, aeroplanes, health and women appear on a regular basis. The atmosphere of the talk between the son and his father changes as often as their mood goes up and down. The conversation fluctuates between sarcasm, irony and personal bitterness of both characters and between respect and mutual love they have towards each other (but keep it unpronounced).

To put all three mentioned Hakl’s literary works in sequence, the narrative of Konec světa plays with a variety of different topics which the main character, Jan Beneš, questions on the way through his life, Sabrina Black explores Beneš’s working life, and his relationship with Petruše and O rodičích a dětech talks of Beneš’s relationship with his father, Ivan. This text features the father’s narratives and his son’s reactions to them and vice versa. It contains the father’s memories of the Second World War and of his life in Yugoslavia at that time, the father’s reminiscences about his marriage, his fatherhood, his friends (and their stories) and his professional experiences as a scientist. It follows his talk about his health problems, his adventures as the ZOO tour guide, his worries about his son and his rather critical opinion of the contemporary world. The son, Honza (Jan), contributes with the memories of his childhood. He talks about his life in the town, Buštěhrad, where he lived with his mother, Zdena, now dead, and with his stepfather. He remembers how his mother cleaned their flat and that his father had problems with alcohol. He speaks about his own youth and his own personal experience with women (he has had two unsuccessful marriages), about his current relationship with Hanka, about his dreams and about his interest in aeroplanes. He shares his opinions (on life, on racism, on food and on a healthy lifestyle), his feelings, his thoughts, his momentary observations of the surrounding atmosphere and the stories of other people, as he has heard them from his father or from others.

From all the above remarks, it follows that the narrative of O rodičích a dětech expands on two different perspectives – on the perspective of the son (as the narrating and the acting ‘I’) and the perspective of his father (as the narrator’s essential counterpart). There are both characters’ perceptions of the past and their perceptions of the present. There are both characters’ experiences of today’s society (because the two characters live within it and are observing it). There are both characters’ internal feelings and thoughts. Nevertheless, the father and the son look at the world from different angles. The father’s views are influenced by the attitude of his generation – he is a representative of the generation of the people who have experienced not only the Second World War and communist Czechoslovakia, in which they have lived for most of their lives, but also the regime change of 1989 and what followed. The father is scarred by years of humiliation (experienced when living under fascism in Yugoslavia and under communism in Czechoslovakia). He has coped with these regimes by isolating himself from them and devoting himself to science and alcohol, though his past traumas have not been forgotten. For years he has been waiting for an appropriate moment to talk about them. The father’s dialogue with his son seems to be the best opportunity for the old man to give his own testimony of life. He is full of scepticism but what he says still has its importance and its value.

The father’s attitude has been formed by many years during which he has lived under a dictatorship. His personal freedom was always limited by the rules created by other people in the name of ideology. The only thing he could do was to find a way of surviving by ‘sneaking through’ – by avoiding political commitment – without losing his integrity. For the seventy-one-year-old father, the arrival of democracy does not mean anything particularly exciting. He continues living in the past. His memories, his job, his health, food, women and his son’s life are the only things that still bring him joy and that are worth discussing, worth becoming angry about. Contemporary Czech society is observed and criticised but more from the perspective of an old man, from the point of view of a person who has most of his life behind him and who does not bother learning about the new world. The father does not have a particular desire to understand it any more, commenting caustically on what is fashionable:

“Blondes have definitely been massively on the increase over the last thirty years,” Father said incredulously. “It didn’t used to be like this. Today there are blonde girls all over the place... Maybe it’s the diet or something...”
 [„Za posledních třicet let strašně přibylo blondýn,“ podivil se otec, „to dřív nebejvalo, dneska je to všude samá blondýna... Jestli je to stravou nebo čím...“] on the media which also in his view influence the ways people think:

“No one gives a toss about the fact that the cetaceans are almost extinct, but everyone’s interested in the fact that a ninety-year-old woman got raped, that was in the papers this morning (...)”
 [„Že kytovci jsou skoro vyhubení, to je každému fuk, ale že někdo znásilnil devadesátiletou bábu, což bylo dneska v novinách, to zajímá všechny.“] and on some of the habits of the new Czech generation:

‘I took a swig and realised Father was staring with a terrified expression at something in one corner of the room. I looked in that direction. There was a bunch of grown-up kids, their hair already going grey, lowering shots of green mint liqueur into freshly drawn pints of beer. The shots descended to the bottom of their mugs like small, heavy divers.
 “Oh Christ...,” Father said slowly.’
 [‘Napil jsem se a zjistil, že otec zděšeně hledí kamsi do kouta. Podíval jsem se tím směrem. Parta prošedivělých dětí si právě pouštěla do čerstvě natočených püllitrů panáka s nalitou zelenou. Panáky padaly ke dnu jako malí těžcí potápěči.
 „No nazdar...,“ řekl pomalu otec.‘] (ORD: 75).

In the father’s present life, the most important things are those which survive any regime change without major harm: memories, science, sex, food. Due to this belief, his dialogue with his son goes in circles and repeatedly comes back to discussing various historical, scientific, culinary or personal topics (women, health and friends). However, it is also true that over the years, the father’s expressed personal views have hardened and narrowed. He appears to be less tolerant and less open now towards the new regime and towards anything he does not know and will probably not have a chance of learning about in detail. He tends to be a bit grumpy, sometimes sentimental, explanatory and apologetic. At other times, he likes to preach to his son, to criticise his behaviour and to persuade him to accept the father’s views as the truth and to force him to accept his vision of the world:

“Something’s always happening! Even if you’re sitting at home in your comfy armchair, something’s always happening! Increasingly sophisticated viruses are continuously trying to reprogramme the way your cells work, antibiotics have almost lost their potency, organisms are being cloned, almost every day an animal species disappears from the planet, the darkies have got the atomic bomb, that's not enough for you? Entire nations are being displaced around the world, is that not enough for you?"

"The only thing I'm interested in is people you can sometimes have an interesting conversation with, and there's not many of them left, either. And don't say darkies!"

[„Bez přestání se něco děje! I kdybys jenom seděl doma ve fotelu, tak se furt něco děje! Čím dál dokonalejší viry se bez přestání snažej přeprogramovat chod tvejh buněk, antibiotika už pomalu nezabíraj, klonuje se, skoro každej den zmizí z planety jeden živočišnej druh, černý huby maj atomovou bombu, to je ti málo? Celý národy se stěhujou po světě, to ti nestačí?“

„Mě už zajímaj jenom lidi, se kterejma se dá vobčas rozumně promluvit, a ani těch moc nezbejvá. A neříkej černý huby!“] (ORD: 47)

Father does all this to provoke the son to a reaction, thus prolonging their conversation and the time shared together:

"There's always a need to talk about the soul! Look around you in the street, or in the metro, just take a moment to look around and you'll get the creeps!"

"From what?"

"The freak show."

"I can see it alright, but it doesn't surprise me one bit. From the moment something takes a wrong turn on the evolutionary path, it just keeps going down it and there's no way of turning it back... Just look at all the growth anomalies around, all those deformations and obvious mutations and aberrations, look at the current U. S. president – with a mug like that, the most you could accomplish a hundred years ago was doing the milk rounds in a loony bin! By that I mean to say that, if we consider the body to be normal today, in what state must the soul be! But knowing you, you probably wanted to say something about yourself..."

[„Furt je potřeba mluvit vo duši! Rozhlídni se na ulici nebo v metru, chvíli se koukej a vosypeš se hrůzou!“

„Z toho panoptika.“

„To sice vidim, ale divit se tomu nemůžu, vono, jak se dá z hlediska vývoje něco na špatnou cestu, tak to po ní pokračuje už furt a není způsob, jak to vrátit... Dyť se podivej, co je všude jenom tělesnejch anomálií, co je všelijakejch deformací a zjevnejch mutací a vodchylek, podivej, jak dneska vypadá prezident Spojenejch států, s timhle ksichtem by před sto lety moh nejvejš roznášet mlíko v blázinci! Tim chci říct, že když je dneska normální, že takhle vypadá tělo, co teprv jak musí vypadat duše! Ale jak tě znám, tys chtěl mluvit spíš vo sobě...“] (ORD: 129).

It is quite evident from the two examples quoted above that the son's attitude to life is much more open and much more tolerant than his father's. The son has also spent many years under the communist rule but this has never affected his attitude to politics. Apart from one occasion (he mentions that he witnessed the arrival of Russian tanks in 1968 when he was still a child), he does not talk about politics or about any moments when politics has affected someone's life. He listens to his father; he asks him about his past but joins the discussion only when it touches on politically neutral subjects. He talks with his father about the differences in their personal taste (types of aeroplanes, types of women, kinds of alcohol) and in their personal attitudes towards contemporary society (work, racism, youth). The father, as a biologist and the representative of the old generation, which has been rooted in certain system and certain ideology, has formed quite a strong critical attitude towards the habits of the new contemporary world and he is not afraid to express it. The son, a person who does not have a firm view on things and who constantly fluctuates between the life in order and the life in chaos does not seem to have a simple answer to all these. His father's comments make him angry although he never expresses it – out of respect to his fatherhood and his age ('father' is always capitalised as 'Father') but also because he lacks confidence in expressing things loudly in front of his father. He suppresses his views and does not remonstrate.

In the dialogue between the father and his son, it is the father who is critical towards the everyday reality of the contemporary world. The son is an observer of what is happening around him. He notes down everything he can see, hear or sense with hardly any personal judgement. In his description of the world, he tries to catch every single impression, speech or sound, and he does it without weighing its positive or negative side:

'Cigarettes in hand, we then entered the heart of the Bubeneč district. The space opening before us, framed by graffiti spattered garages, decomposing villas, and brand new used car salons, was called Papírenská Street.'

['Potom jsme s cigaretou v ruce vstoupili do srdce Bubenče. Počmáranými garážemi, zpuchřelými vilami a fungl novými autobazary ohraničený prostor, který se před námi otevřel, se nazýval Papírenská ulice.'] (ORD: 36).

The son does not make any direct personal comment on contemporary Czech society. His opinion is fully reflected in the way in which he observes the world around himself during the walks with his father (as in the above example), not in spoken words. He notices things – for instance, he notices the contemporary image of Bubeneč quarter, a quarter with history of a large villa estate built at the end of the 19th and the beginning of the 20th century, but nowadays decomposing and losing its original brilliance next to commercial, impersonal present (brand new used car salons).

Representatives of three generations meet in this book by Hakl: the father's, the son's and finally also the youngest generation of grandsons and granddaughters. Whilst the first two generations, represented by the two main characters, respond to what they see around them in the text, the youngest generation is only the object of their conversation. The youngest generation is criticised by the father, observed and in part also defended by the son. However, the grandchildren (the new contemporary society) never have a chance to speak for themselves. The existence of the youngest generation serves as a background for the performances of father and son.

The image of society in the narrative of O rodičích a dětech is again very similar to the image introduced in Hakl's previous works. All is happening within the frame of the same world and within the experience of the one single narrating character, Jan Beneš. Only this time, the line of the 'life according to Jan Beneš' leads to his family.

5.3 O létajících objektech: 'I' amongst the 'aliens' and with them

In 2004, Emil Hakl published his fourth work of fiction entitled O létajících objektech (On Flying Objects, henceforth LO). Once again, Hakl produced a work in which he gathered short stories with a similar theme (life within the contemporary world). The volume contains twelve stories (two of them are constructed from several subchapters carrying separate titles or, alternatively, numbers; one of them is a photo-story).

Most of the stories are again told from the first person perspective and by Honza (Jan) Beneš who has the same characteristic features as the narrators we already know from Hakl's previous works. Placed among them, we find the story 'Dva dny ze života Evy F.' ('Two days in the life of Eva F.') which is told from the female perspective, and the story 'Večer' ('Evening') retold by another male narrating character. A photo-story, 'Pejsek (fotopovídka Mira Švolíka)' – ('Doggie, a photo story by Miro Švolík') – holds a special position. It consists of fifteen pictures without any additional text.

When analyzing Konec světa, we discussed the narrating and the acting 'I' of the text. We have also argued that Konec světa can be seen as a novel because of its characteristic features and its structure that is built as a 'life according to Jan Beneš'. We cannot draw the same conclusion about O létajících objektech, at least not completely. The three stories mentioned above are testimonies made by different characters. From this perspective, they are individual. However, as we will see below, they are built on similar grounds and this makes them rightful participants in the structure of Hakl's literary work.

In O létajících objektech, the main narrating character Jan (Honza) Beneš is again a man in his forties. He still lives in Prague, he still writes and struggles with occasional employment, he still enjoys going to a variety of pubs; he still talks to different people and contemplates his own feelings and thoughts. The world in which this Honza lives and which he observes is again not very different from the one introduced in Hakl's previous works. Only this time, the world he describes is even more distorted and confused. It is stranger and even more 'alien' than before. Things that Honza observes in this volume look to him as though they have been brought to this world from a different planet and as though they have hugely attacked it. People and their noisy and everlasting presence remind him of a swarm of insects, always in a clustery motion:

'The smoky sky above his head had been vertically cut by a thin white beam of light. Although it was past ten o'clock, the inside of the building was still alive. Lively, gesticulating figures were streaming up and down the escalators. Shops were bursting with noise. Cafés were buzzing. Young salegirls, allured by the trappings of advertised promises, were yawning out of boredom. Hundreds of mandibles were trying to process numerous salads, crisps and sandwiches, lipstick painted lips were sucking spaghetti, lame pincers of old gaffers were pulping chicken fillets. In front of the entrance door, an unfinished fountain was bubbling among black marble-slabs.'

[‘Zakouřenou oblohu nad jeho střechou prořezával kolmo do výšky tenký bílý paprsek. Ačkoliv bylo deset pryč, uvnitř to žilo. Po eskalátorech plynuly živě gestikulující figurky. Řvaly tam obchody. Hučely kavárny. Žívaly mlad'ouнкé prodavačky, chycené na inzerát do pasti. Stovky kusadel tam zpracovávaly saláty, brambůrky, chlebíčky, rtěnkou obarvená makadla srkala špagety, polámané chelicery starých fotrů drtily kuřecí řízky. Před vchodem bublal mezi hromadami černých mramorových desek nedostavěný vodotrysk.‘] (LO: 10-11)

The space around Honza is full of his visions that describe an alienated world. Prague buildings become like structures created by UFOs. He describes them as if they were animals and all that was inside them was their internal organs, vessels, veins and liquids. The situations Honza comes across, the people he meets, the places he passes, all form a picture of the world which confuses him. Everything he experiences he finds incredible and hard to understand. He walks the streets and meets a girl holding a dog dying from a wound caused by a cross-bow. On his trip to the countryside, he and his friends lose their way and, at a building site, a man shoots at them with a gun. With an American lady, he conducts a long discussion on life, exploring his theory of disguise (living as within the shell of a spacesuit) and the chaotic emptiness outside it. Tourists, filling the space around him, remind him of aliens; they look to him unbelievable and strange and he feels lost and breathless surrounded by them. A handless waiter is carrying a tray with two 'shots filled up to the top with a poisonous reminiscence of something we used to drink once' [‘panáky naplněné až po okraj jedovatou reminiscencí na něco, co se kdysi dalo pít.‘] (LO: 67). When buying meat at a local butcher's, Honza is listening to the news on the radio about a human hand found in a rubbish bin. In the street, he is stopped by a twenty-five-year-old girl who asks him for a cigarette and afterwards offers him sex. Outside the new Carrefour supermarket, a new artificial hill stands, made from the soil dug out for the construction purposes. As he finds out from a random boy, the trees planted on this hill were brought here by trucks and grass carpets were rolled over the land. The bailiff who comes to visit him in order to speak about his debts turns out to be an amateur poet. A goat is carrying a heavy chain around its neck and a pilot, whom Honza Beneš meets on his holiday, talks about buying his dog a bitch.

Honza's 'alienated' visions expand even more as they are fed by his interest in world cinema and literature (which he often quotes). Together, they create an incredible, almost apocalyptic, picture of the human race, similar to the one commented in Konec světa. This time though, the vision is even more intense and expressive:

'In front of me a man was hurtling on his motorbike along the pavement towards me. His back mirror touched my sleeve, only lightly, and he was away. I passed a few people who resembled a well-made-up group of extras waiting to act in a story taking place fifty years after a global nuclear catastrophe. I saw a big lump of a woman swallowing a whole potato pancake at once. I saw a lame man with a severe squint. I saw a pensioner with the look of a dolphin, with a smooth face without any features whatsoever. There was a convoy of little children with evil eyes and bat-ears. There was a granny with a tiny, almost bald, head, three or four wisps of tangly hair remaining on it. She looked at me, pouted her little goat mouth and let out a sharp laugh.'

['Naproti mně se po chodníku řítí člověk na motorce. Lehce mi lízl zpětným zrcátkem rukáv, opravdu jenom lehce, a byl pryč. Minul jsem několik lidí připomínajících náročně namaskovaný kompars k příběhu odehrávajícímu se padesát let po globální jaderné katastrofě. Odulou machnu, polykající vcelku bramborák. Krutě šilhajícího muže s koňskou nohou. Delfíniho starce s hladkým obličejem, prostým jakýchkoliv rysů. Konvoj drobounkých dětí se zlýma očima a netopýřima ušima. Babičku s malinkou holou hlavou, ze které trčely tři čtyři chomáče zhoudelených vlasů. Ta na mě pohlédla, našpulila kozí pusinku a ostře se uchechtla. '] (LO: 154).

In O létajících objektech, the narrating Honza once again analyzes and observes his feelings of confusion regarding the contemporary world. As he struggles, his mind travels back to his past, back to his own self and other people's stories only to find out where exactly is his place within all that intensive chaos the present life offers him. As an unemployed man, he locks himself up in his flat where he lies on the sofa, watches TV and allows himself to be fully absorbed in its fictive reality, far from the real world which confuses him and which he claims he does not understand. He writes but, when he writes, he does not seem to be himself either. He is sceptical about his self as well as about the outside world. He calls himself an idiot to whom people speak only out of pretended politeness. He sympathizes with a random girl's statement that all people are 'cunts' and he thinks of himself in the same manner.

As Honza is dubious about his personal position, he is unhappy with the whole world and society living in it. His doubts increase when his friend says he cannot come to see him because he is ill. This is something that his friend would never do in the past. As a reaction to this, Honza questions everything the present has brought to people; he wonders what has happened to their past and where all the fun and careless freedom they possessed when young and single has gone. He asks existential questions and expresses existential thoughts about humans and their reaction to the passing time:

'Where are we, a sudden thought occurred to me. Where are we and what are we doing here!? Where did all the fun we used to share go? The only thing we have been doing lately is swearing, grouching and laughing at the same things all over and over again; where is real humour? Where are those days when we kept drinking the whole night through until late morning, when we ran from one big beat concert to another and then set off to work straight afterwards? Nowadays, the only thing we are able to do is walk and talk. And even this we do not enjoy anymore!'
 ['Kde to jsme, napadlo mě. Kde to jsme a co to tu vyvádíme!? Kam se poděla sranda? Poslední dobou už jenom sekáme pyskem, pořád dokola nadáváme na ty samé věci a těm samým věcem se smějeme, kde je humor? Kde jsou ty časy, kde jsme pili do rána a líтали po bigbítech a ráno šli do práce? Teď už se jenom procházíme a mlátíme pantem, a ani to nás už nebaví!'] (LO: 144)

Honza is disappointed with the current state of his generation, with his friend and he also criticizes other people. At the same time, he cannot come to terms with the sudden growth of new supermarkets around him or with the streets overcrowded by tourists. It is only through contemplation and experience that he is finally able to achieve some sort of peace. It is only through observation that he is finally able to find himself, his place in the world and his joy of living.

What the narrator of most of the stories collected in O létajících objektech describes is the feelings of a man in a mid-life crisis; a man who wanders about the world but cannot recognize it any longer. Everything around him seems to be changing and he feels it is changing for the worse; his friends are growing old and they bore him, women starve him of sex and shocking news hovers around. He feels like a lost boy whose youth has been stolen and, instead, he has been given an existence in a new, chaotic world. However, as time goes on, he realizes that the only way to cope with his confusion is to accept the world the way the world is now and carry on, and this he also does. Then he claims:

‘I was standing on a hilltop covered by darkness. And suddenly I had it. I understood that in fact everything was ok here. Completely everything. That all those chintzy ideals for which people used to perish for thousands of years – good, evil, justice, all these kinds of things – are gone. Or they are still here, but no one really takes them for real anymore, luckily. (...) I realised that it was enough to be purely here on one’s own behalf; that there was no reason to become angry about unimportant details. This is simply the point we had reached and from here we would go on. (...) Suddenly an unclear but unexpectedly strong feeling of luck filled my head; luck that I lived at this and at no other time (...).’

[‘Stál jsem na kopci v černé tmě. A zčistajasna mi došlo, že je to tu vlastně všechno v nejlepším pořádku. Úplně všechno. Že už jsou pryč ty křiklavě nabarvené plechové ideály, kvůli kterým se chcípalo několik tisíc let, dobro, zlo, pravda, kdesi cosi. Že jsou tu sice pořád, ale nikdo je naštěstí už nebere vážně. (...) Došlo mi, že už opravdu stačí být jenom sám za sebe. A že není nejmenší důvod rozčilovat se kvůli nějakým nepodstatným detailům. Sem to zkrátka došlo a odtud to zase půjde dál. (...) A zalehlo mě nejasné, ale zato nečekaně silné štěstí, že žiju právě v tomhle a ne jiném čase (...).’] (LO: 157-158).

This gradual shift from resisting the ‘alienated’ world and then coming to terms with it, the gradual shift from confusion to personal openness, is also reflected in the structure of the volume. As we have said above, the volume O létajících objektech (On Flying Objects) contains twelve stories. ‘Blízká setkání’ (‘Close Encounters’) reveals Honza’s discovery of the ‘alienated’ world of Czech society. The reference to Spielberg’s Close Encounters of the Third Kind (1977), seems to be more than obvious. Both Spielberg’s film and Hakl’s stories follow the story of a man whose life went through a lot of changes after he had encountered an unidentified flying object and he struggles to come to terms with it. The story, ‘Amerika je zkrátka Amerika’ (‘America is simply America’), describes Honza’s meeting with an American woman and their discussion on American films, his fantastic theories and her frustration due to lack of sex. The third story with the significant title, ‘O létajících objektech’ (‘On Flying Objects’), revolves around Honza’s adventures which he experiences with his friends during their journey through the countryside. This time, the flying objects are the bullets fired by the man protecting a building site. The scene appears as if it was taken from some unspecified Western movie which has been shifted to the Czech environment. The next story, called ‘Dusno’ (‘Muggy’), expresses Honza’s surliness and confusion which he feels in the middle of a crowd of tourists in the Old Town of Prague. He imagines that people who surround him are Martians whom he is never going to understand. In ‘Podivín’ (‘Weirdo’), Honza listens to his female friend’s story of her relationship with a man who had decided to prefer a collection of toy army vehicles to going out with her. In ‘Macha’ (‘The Routine’), Honza looks critically at his writing skills and his life. Sitting in a pub with one of his friends he gets nostalgic, thinking of his past experience at school, of girls and of bedtime stories.

After these six short stories narrated by the same Honza Beneš, the volume includes the three stories which are told from the perspectives of other people. The story, 'Dva dny ze života Evy F.' ('Two days in the life of Eva F.'), describes the journey which two characters – Eva and her husband Josef – take in order to find a way back to their own selves and to their relationship. The road that awaits them is both real and symbolic. It takes them to an exploration of their momentary state of mind and to an examination of their attitude to reality. It is a test of their relationship, of their mutual tolerance and love. It reveals their fears and their personal differences.

In this story, the man and the woman both oppose each other and support each other. On one side, there is the man (Josef) who does not want to be a hero and prefers doing only those things that are safe and that cannot cause any personal damage or change to him and to others. From his perspective, his whole life has dried out and so the only thing he can do is to accept what is going on in the world and carry on. On the other side, there is the woman (Eva) and her way of seeing the world. Since she is the narrator of the story, we learn a lot about her and about her perception of the world. Eva is more open and more sensitive towards reality than Josef. She is still full of hope that nothing is lost and everything can be fixed. Where Eva comes with a positive view, there Josef appears as a pessimist. She is the one who wants to have children; he is the one who does not. She believes in the exceptionality of each individual and in the individual's power and strength; he dismisses all this. She is an idealist and romantic; he is a rationally acting man who has already thought through the questions of his future life and has decided on his own what to do next, not taking her into consideration at all. His scepticism towards society leads him to claim that we are all 'in the shit' ['v hajzlu'] (LO: 97) and the only way to survive it is to be completely passive and to avoid any changes.

The story, 'Dva dny ze života Evy F.', is about two individuals, two representatives of two different genders and two different worlds who meet on their life journey and who do not really know how to protect their relationship against the outside world and against themselves. While Eva seems to see the solution in founding a family, Josef talks about being passive towards everything life offers. While Eva dreams of children and love, Josef talks about sexual desire and its destructive powers. Where Eva is confused by what she sees as male deviousness and fear, there Josef invokes rational behaviour and behaves with the frigidity of a man who is willing to gamble for life when his or her life is in danger but denies everything else. What connects Eva and Josef is their habit and love, regardless of the fact that they are so different. What separate them are their individualities and their different ways of seeing life and the future.

The photo-story, 'Pejsek' ('Doggie'), features a man's and a woman's frustration from their unfulfilled sexuality. It shows a woman with desire for a man's attention. It also shows a man who refuses to give this woman this attention. It shows a naked woman who is desperate for intimacy and sex with a man. It also shows a man who does not know how to behave with this naked woman and either turns away or leaves. The third non-Honza story is entitled 'Večer' ('Evening'). Once again, it is the testimony of a middle-aged married man who is losing his sexual interest in his wife when he sees her ageing body. Instead of her, he prefers his solitude or the company of the virtual reality of computers.

The last three stories of the volume are once more in the hands of the narrating character of Honza. 'Události a komentáře' ('News and Comments') again highlights Honza's feeling of loneliness in the alienated world that surrounds him and of his passive acceptance of this. 'Vyhlídkové lety nad mořem' ('Sightseeing flights above the sea') and 'Nesmíš se dát!' ('No one must get you!') feature (extra)ordinary stories that Honza has heard from some other people or has experienced during his holidays in the Czech countryside.

All the twelve stories of O létajících objektech deal with the same topics. They are testimonies of people who live in the contemporary world. They feature tales of confusion in which the personal pendulum of each individual constantly swings between recognition of the new social lifestyle and its denial, between the will to act and the passive observation and acceptance of what is around. This is the theme of all previously published writings by Hakl. In Hakl's earlier work, the theme of confusion dominates. It also dominates in O létajících objektech in the first six stories narrated by Honza and in the two stories narrated by other characters as well as in the photo-story, 'Pejsek', but the last three stories centre more on acceptance of the new reality and new presence. In O létajících objektech, the narrator Honza realizes that, if he accepts the new reality, he can still exist comfortably and enjoy all the stories the world offers without depression.

The text of O létajících objektech was published in 2004, about fifteen years after the fall of communism and the re-introduction of the new economic, political and social lifestyle. By 2004, capitalism had put down its roots firmly in Czech society and commercial principles and “managerialism” would have assumed control over all walks of life.⁵⁹ The writer consciously observes all these changes and points out some of their significant features in his work. He notes that pubs have now regular opening hours; that there are chain stores and shopping centres which are open twenty-four-seven; that bailiffs come to knock on the debtors’ doors; that cinemas and television show mostly American films and TV series, and that Prague is full of foreigners. Haki’s narrator walks, passing the places he should know well but he suddenly cannot identify them anymore. He meets people but cannot understand them. He talks to various women, listens to their appeals but stays completely detached from any possibility of a close relationship. All the places and people seem to him strange. He is fully alienated from the new society. Places have lost their original shapes. People have lost their anchors, their roots and their confidence for life. The gap between men and women has grown and friendship does not have the same qualities as before. The narrating Honza Beneš as well as the narrators of ‘Dva dny ze života Evy F.’, ‘Večer’ and a photo-story ‘Pejsek’ feel that more and more barriers are built between male and female individuals, between individuals and society and between the communist past and the present world but do hardly anything to change it. Honza Beneš as well as other three narrators of O létajících objektech reacts to the new state of affairs with criticism and with a sceptic eye. However, it is only Honza Beneš who finally manages to discover the light of understanding and acceptance at the other side of confusion and chaos that the present world brings him and he expresses it with a newly found peace of mind.

5.4 Let čarodějnice: troubles with communication

In 2008, Emil Haki published the novel, Let čarodějnice (A Flight of the Witch, henceforth LC). It is again a story about Honza Beneš’s life and again introduced from a slightly different angle. The narrative takes place in the first years of the 21st century. It again describes Czech society as it looks, in his view, almost twenty years after the fall of communism: there are large chain-store shopping centres, American films, mobile phones and omnipresent advertising and consumerism. Honza is again totally confused by the new society. On one hand, he operates within mainstream society by working for a low-brow, glossy magazine, writing articles about the lives of celebrities; on the other hand, he admits he can do this job only under the influence of marihuana. He does his food shopping in the local supermarket but cannot bear the crowds and the recklessness of some people. At the first opportunity, he explodes and stabs one of the security guards with a pen knife. The mobile phone becomes his main tool for communication with women. Marihuana keeps him active and well-behaved in the company of his workmates; its effects help him cope with the requirements put on him by his employer and by the society he questions. This is the way he lives in Prague and tries to enjoy it. However, this does not last. Honza realizes that this is not how he wants to live. When there is a chance to escape, he accepts an internship in Lisbon. However, when the internship finishes, he does not return to Prague. In Lisbon, he shares a flat with Iris, a girl of half-Hungarian origin, and her aunt Bea, and earns money by delivering various strange parcels to the most awkward places. He cuts himself off from everything connected with Czech life – from women and from work. But again, his stay in Portugal is only a temporary solution and, as soon as he realizes that he cannot live there, he returns home, renews the relationship with a girl Barunka, gets in touch with his ex-wife, his friends, visits the man he knifed in the supermarket and finds a new job. At home, he loses his mother (who dies); in Portugal, he loses Iris (who moves back to her husband) as well as her aunt Bea (who dies shortly after he leaves).

No matter where he stays, Honza finds communication with the outside world and the people living around him still very difficult. He works himself into a state where he talks to his Czech girlfriends only by mobile phone and he is only able to talk to anyone when he is under the influence of marihuana or alcohol. He is hardly able to speak with his mother and sister. The two women he meets in Portugal, Iris and Bea, are exceptions to this rule. They make it possible for him to say things freely, for their conversation is the result of mutual effort to understand each other's languages and worlds rather than to fight with the prejudice of his own kin.

The most difficult relationship Honza has is with his mother. From everything he says about her, we feel a great distance has grown between mother and son over the years of his adulthood. On the one hand, there is the mother, a former sympathizer with the Communist Party, for many years an organizer of official cultural-political entertainment shows. On the other hand, there is the son whose personal background is that of the anti-communist social periphery. The mother and the son are thus incompatible and this incompatibility never disappears. The mother is now retired. She is writing her personal memoirs. The son does not argue with her anymore; he visits her, does the shopping and helps her run her household. Yet, neither of them is able to talk freely to the other. Both are wrapped up in their own thoughts and they disregard anything else that transcends their narrow personal interest. Honza's attitude to his mother does not change even after he learns about his mother's death. He looks at her body and sees the body of a stranger. He turns to her writing hoping this might help him to understand her life, but does not find anything which might bring him closer to her.

Honza's relationship with his mother fails because they are both totally different personalities and because they refuse to find a way to adapt to each other. His engagement within Czech society fails as a result of his experiences at work in the editorial office of a popular magazine and as a result of his perceptions while walking the streets and observing Prague life. Honza's boss on the glossy magazine is a lady who will make any personal sacrifice in order to get a good interview with a celebrity. His colleagues at work, mostly women, are pictured as dull office workers who love chocolates and laugh at Honza's jokes. The world of Czech celebrities is a world of hypocrisy:

'Many of them did not tolerate any interruptions and said only what they wanted to say. Others revealed everything about themselves, then they thought about it but, during the process of authorization of the interview, at the last minute they started sending manic tracts overloaded with general moralizations. When this happened, the whole article had to be completely broken down into bits and then again built up, while the graphic designers vomited their gastric juices, for the text should have been sent to print five minutes ago. Most frequently, however, I did battle with unemotional robots, pre-set to behave in a detached way, and I always lost. Such people used language which disintegrated when you tried to write it down and melted into evil-smelling slop. They always attempted to look pleasant while trying to hide the existence of their villas or of their wife who was in a psychiatrist's care. This made me anxious. I did not need to care, for even the most widely read Czech daily newspapers produced only helpless noise, and grammatical and stylistic and factual mistakes had long since formed one, large, dirty inflationary river.'

['Mnozí si do toho nenechali mluvit a řekli jen, co chtěli. Jiní na sebe pověděli první poslední, ale při autorizaci se jim to rozleželo a posílali na poslední chvíli traktáty plné maniakálně přezdobených všeobecných moralizmů. Takže se stať musela komplet rozebrat a znovu poskládat, zatímco grafici blili žaludeční šťávy, jelikož to mělo jít před pěti minutami do tisku. Nejčastěji však šlo o předem ztracené klání s chladně nastavenými roboty, používajícími řeč, která při prvním pokusu převést ji do psané podoby tála a rozpouštěla se ve škaredě páchnoucí louži. Bývalo mi úzko z té jejich snahy být za každou cenu fajn, zatlouct ty vily, manželku v péči psychiatra. Mohlo mi to být fuk, i nejčtenější deníky v republice už vydávaly jen bezmocný lomoz a gramatické a stylistické a faktické chyby dávno plynuly v kalný inflační veletok. '] (LC: 109) and the Czech print media is regarded as the power which blindly follows profit instead of quality. The only way Honza can cope with working for a magazine like this is to smoke marihuana, as he believes that its effects allow him to look at things in a laid back manner and with detachment. In doing so, Honza is able to withdraw from his bosses, managers and leaders, who act selfishly and ignorantly, as well as from his colleagues at work who act subserviently and are two-faced. Apart from using marihuana, Honza also escapes from his daily routine by travelling to the countryside and to Portugal, by watching films or by reminiscence of children's stories which he read in the past. Honza is always escaping. He hides in other 'virtual' worlds from the ferocity of his work, from women, from his family and from his own personal cowardice and fear that he feels after stabbing a man in the supermarket. The world seems to him to run too fast; too many things are happening around him and he does not have the power to stop them. His journey to Portugal and his prolonged stay there give him a chance to get out of the never-ending world of interviews and articles he is forced to write in order to fulfil the expectations of his boss. It offers him the desired break from his unsettled and unclear relationship with Barunka. It enables him to flee from Czech society, in his view superficial in actions and thoughts, tragic in the idleness of its behaviour and ridiculous in its effort to embrace fully the capitalist system. His stay in Portugal, although it lasts only for a few months, also gives him rest and peace; it provides him with time to gather his strength to come back home and cope with life in his native country again.

Honza also searches for help from his overloaded existence at a psychiatrist's and a healer's but the only outcome is that he is given tablets to reduce his anxiety. He looks for help in his mother's writings but does not find anything that might tell him why he feels so excluded from society. He seeks understanding from a lady called Barunka and accepts her flat as a place of hiding after he stabs the supermarket guard, but Barunka is not the solution to his problems with his own identity. Neither is the Portuguese break.

Reality in Let čarodějnice is constructed from a variety of narratives. There are Honza's own stories as well as the stories of the people who live around him. There is some other material which Honza uses in his text: his mother's writing, letters from magazine readers, various articles, adverts, films scenes and tales he has made up. The tension between all these conflicting narratives attracts Honza. It makes him look through each text in order to seek an explanation of the world around him and of the way people live. All this is the material that provides him with impulses to start thinking critically about society. Honza looks for answers within the texts. He is strongly interested in language as a vehicle that signifies these texts, that signifies particular individual who wrote them and Czech society which influenced them. His relish for a diversity of words and their function is a matter of his professional career as well as of his personal curiosity and enjoyment. It is a part of his job to go through the texts written by other people in order to check their compatibility with the house style of the magazine and he does not seem to enjoy this. He points out that whenever he tries to use unusual language humour in the magazine articles, he is criticised for being irrational, too 'difficult' and too abstract for the readers. It is also a part of his personal interest to analyze the texts and, within them, to seek his understanding and truth of his personal attitude and life.

Honza likes to observe words and to play with them, with their flexibility and their sounds. By playing this game, he again hides his personality behind it. He has a special taste for words which originate in the animal kingdom. The names of existing animals, their diminutives and their fictional counterparts are used as metaphors of the human form and human behaviour. And this applies to him as well as to the description of other characters:

'I was a proudie, I was proud. Karel, Kája, Michal or Martin, mole, spider. A Proudie-cunt with a capital P, a Daftie and a junkie; surprisingly, my memory was now my sharpest instrument. A functional lack of concentration and memory do not go well together.'

['Byl jsem pyšánek, pyšan. Karel, Kája, Michal nebo Martin, krtek, pavouk. Pyšan s velkým pé, Blboš a feťák, paměť byla teď kupodivu můj nejostřejší nástroj, funkční nesoustředěnost a paměť spolu nemají co dělat. '] (LC: 134).

Honza's girlfriend, Barunka, takes him for a proud junkie who enjoys his marihuana trips too much. His female boss calls him various names, never addressing him by his real name. He sees himself as a mole who escapes the light and happiness and hides in a dark hole, in his flat-burrow. He is a spider, a predator that spins his net to catch victims, but then lets them pursue their own destiny as he cares no longer. All the pictures he draws of his own character are full of strong self-criticism, irony and sarcasm. Honza does not seem to value himself very highly but neither does he think highly of the Czech society to which he belongs. His life is a verbal extravaganza. Words serve as an instrument for his observations, his feelings and his criticism and doubtful tolerance of society. The reality he experiences is the subject of his perception; it is much more passively observed than enjoyed and lived. Because living, it seems to him, is chaotic and painful.

Let čarodějnice is again the story of a man who finds it very difficult to relate to the world of today. The only way he can survive is by means of numerous escapes to different realities. However, he is not the only one who suffers from such a predicament. His mother encloses herself in the memories of her past life; Barunka isolates herself within her affection for Honza; his friend, Arnošt, locks himself up in a hut located far away from civilization. Communication between these individuals and the outside world is still possible, but the gap between them seems to be growing. Their world is made up of confusion and chaos. They are confusion and chaos, and this is one of the messages this novel communicates.

The hint of acceptance so apparent in the last three short stories of Hakl's previous work seems to disappear in this Hakl's novel. Confusion from the current world is overwhelming.

5.5 Pravidla směšného chování: an end, or a new departure?

Hakl's 2010 prose, Pravidla směšného chování (The Rules of Laughable Behaviour, henceforth PSC), is again a contribution to the reader's knowledge about Honza's (Jan Beneš's) life; it continues the story of the same autobiographical narrator and people and places which surround him. Thematically, the prose, which addresses us in three parts, follows the story of a son Honza (Jan) Beneš – a fifty-year-old man, and his dying father, Ivan. We may find a forerunner to this work in O rodičích a dětech. Pravidla směšného chování bears witness to the end of one stage in Honza's life – the period when he was a son.

The work consists of three separate parts but what the writer finally produces is a single, integrated account. Pravidla směšného chování is the story of a person whose life has more or less disintegrated after he has found himself alone, after he has lost his wife (see Konec světa), his son, the love of his latest girlfriend, Hanka (see O rodičích a dětech) with whom he had been happily living, his mother (see Let čarodějnice) and finally his father. The book is a self-ironic account of Honza's actions, talks and thoughts during the days of his father's hospitalization and death. The three stories are interconnected and all of them are narrated in the present tense, unlike the previous texts which were basically written in the past tense. The first story coincides with one of the last phone calls the son has with his father before he goes to the hospital. In the second story, the son listens to his hospitalized father and later to some recordings he made with his father during the last days of his life and some time before. In the third story, the son is looking for the best place to scatter the ashes of his father's cremated body.

Everything that is happening in all the three stories serves only as a catalyst for various thoughts that go through Honza's mind when sharing the last minutes with his father and shortly after his death. Whatever occurs during this period, no matter if it is paragliding, walking in the streets or rowing on the Danube, all serve only as a background to the real story that is once again happening in Honza's mind. When paragliding above the Czech countryside (in the story ‘Ve visu’ – ‘In hanging’), his thoughts drift back and forth between the present and the past. The momentary feelings of the person who finds himself imprisoned in the company of two practically unknown men (Rulpo and Murgo) and later tied to the paragliding equipment are intertwined with his memories of his former girlfriend, Hafina, the years spent in the army, his uncle and his random meeting with both the above-mentioned men. The regular visits he pays to his father, in the hospital or at home (in the story ‘Pravidla směšného chování’ – ‘The Rules of Laughable Behaviour’), are complemented with random walks and talks with his friend, text messages to his girlfriend and recordings of his phone calls with his father made some time ago. His trip to the Danube delta in Romania and to the sea (in the story ‘Hřbitov na pláži’ – ‘The Graveyard on the Beach’) is not only a random holiday trip he tries to enjoy with Murgo and Rulpo but also the fulfilment of the promise he had given to his father before his father died. The narrative connects the personal stories of each participant, Honza’s perceptions of the surrounding country life and, again, a mobile phone conversation between him and the same girl-friend.

Once again, the world Emil Hakl introduces in this book shows a society of people who lack an ability to respond to the requirements which the present time puts in front of them. The narrating Honza himself again seems to have serious problems with his life. Often he encloses himself in his own inner world of images and words, letting in only those who cannot harm his contested freedom and solitude. It is easy for him to share a pint with his friends, Vlád’a or Michal as, in their company, he does not have to pretend anything (compare with Konec světa). He finds communication with women much harder than before. His attitude towards a ‘mobile phone’ lady is very distant, as is her attitude to him. She blames him that he is distant from her, she criticises him for his ignorance, his self-centredness and his cowardice. In spite of all this criticism, Honza cannot avoid texting her but protects himself by keeping away from any intimacy that could develop if they meet. Out of fear, he prefers a safe distance to the possible devastating effects of a relationship.

The communication between Honza and his two mates, Murgo and Rulpo, floats on the waves of mutual agreement to be silent when needed, to talk when it seems necessary to talk. Murgo and Rulpo are good friends. One day, they turn up in front of Honza and later they do this twice more – they take him paragliding and to the Danube delta. Conversation, when it happens, occurs mainly between Murgo and Rulpo. Honza is always left aside – firstly, because he does not share the environment the two friends come from, and secondly, because he wants to be alone. Once again, there is a certain conflict between his thoughts and actions. When considering things in his mind, Honza often denies them; when things happen, he accepts them. He does not want to go paragliding but, in the end, he does go. He does not enjoy flying but pretends it was a great experience. He rarely expresses his own opinion. Rather, he keeps all his thoughts locked up inside his head. If he does talk, the outcome he sees is more than awkward.

The same problem Honza has with communicating with others also appears in his relationship to his father, as we can observe best in the novella, O rodičích a dětech. In Pravidla směšného chování, his behaviour towards his father becomes more sincere, tolerant and open. Here, Honza suddenly realizes that there is no need for him to hide his thoughts anymore. His father is dying. Questions are answered, private experiences and doubts shared. Their mutual conversations circle on various topics but none of them goes very deep. Both talk about scientific discoveries, about politics, about the son's work or about women. The father complains, the son listens, possibly giving back certain facts and answers. Honza's time finally comes when sitting at the bed of his unconscious father. There, he finally uses the opportunity and, with no internal barriers, he speaks of everything that touches his mind. He speaks of life as he perceives it, critically and with admiration too:

“It might look strange, the fact that I am interested in such rubbish,” I say. “I am simply fascinated by this gratuitously vehement optimism and the traumas of the twentieth century, this alternation of slaughtering and the paradise of flourishing economies. The gradual transformation of a careless outing into a march of death. I am interested in the real shape of these moments ...”
[„Možná je divný, že se zabývám takovejma kravinama,“ říkám. „Mě zkrátka fascinuje ten bezdůvodně prudkej optimizmus a traumata dvacátýho století, střídání jatek s rajskejma zahradama kvetoucích ekonomik. Plynulej přerod bezstarostnýho vejletu v pochod smrti. Zajímá mě pravá podoba těch chvil.(...)“] (PSC: 62)

This is the only moment when Honza feels free to express himself – he is talking to someone who is not going to oppose him, only listen. It is the same opportunity that Honza had, for example, with the Chinese girl in Konec světa. She, too, was unable to understand him. The language of unconscious people or the language of foreigners gives Honza a freedom to say things that are normally stuck behind the barrier of his own doubt.

Pravidla směšného chování is another chapter of the oeuvre Emil Hakl has published since 2000. But now the main character, the narrating character Honza, is slightly older, around fifty years of age. He is employed but works from home, and he still writes. He lives alone. Apart from his ‘mobile phone’ girl-friend, he does not mention having any sexual affairs.

He has never ceased to enjoy friendly beers with his peers. He loves his father, though he blames him for the years of his childhood. His relationship towards the other family members is very impersonal. He is a good observer and a good recorder of everything he is able to absorb with all of his five senses. Everything he chooses to say is noted down in its raw form – as natural as it could be. The language is a mixture of proper Czech (in indirect speech) and its colloquial counterpart. There is also Russian, English and French, mostly in their broken form (in the direct speech of the characters). When the toothless father speaks, this is presented as Honza perceives it. The same principle is used when Honza tries to take down all the sounds he can recognize from the phone calls he receives during his paragliding experience. He attempts to catch everything in detail. After all, these are his last days with his father.

In Pravidla směšného chování, Emil Hakl depicts Czech (specifically Prague) society as it exists more than twenty years after the fall of the communist regime. The narrator, Honza, seems to have found stability so that he is able to work, but he still lives alone, not able to keep a relationship with any woman. Age and loneliness do not seem to bother him much. However, this all changes after he experiences his father's death which forces him to contemplate his situation. Still, he keeps out of mainstream Czech society. He does not rush about, although mobile phones, taxis, paragliding and billboards become part of his everyday reality. He even becomes a part of the mainstream culture when posing for a billboard advertisement, which was originally meant as a protest against the pettiness of the famous, but has resulted in Honza's self-exposure. He then feels that he has made himself into a laughing stock.

The position of the other characters in the work by Emil Hakl does not seem to be any less complicated than before. The characters are also just as diffident as ever in Hakl's prose. The 'mobile phone' lady, the woman with whom Honza exchanges text messages, has basically wasted her youth. She is a woman who now yearns for intimacy after many years of wild and chaotic personal relationships and alcohol abuse. Rulpo and Murgo lead lives of everyday surprises and enjoyment. But, like Honza, they live on their own. Honza's father, a grumpy old man who lately used to be a caring person, fights his illness by exercising his memory and by questioning his son about certain discoveries in biology, comparing his knowledge with what can be found on the internet.

In Pravidla směšného chování, Hakl presents a picture of the same society we know from his previous work. Furthermore, the style he uses to describe his fictive world follows the same principles. But this time, the composition of the text is much more tied up with Honza's story. The text does not stretch out in various directions; it holds on to a single line and enriches it with details which Honza perceives at the given moment. In comparison with other texts by Emil Hakl, this moment is always the immediate present. Honza's memories are no longer the only important thing. The thing that matters now is the present world, everything that is happening right now. There is no reason to go back in time anymore. It is too late. The present itself is overwhelming; it swallows up everything and everyone around. Honza's dying father is a true symbol of the departing times. And, with the father's death, comes the son's recognition of the present and the 'new'. Is this the end of 'life according to Honza Beneš'? Or is it just the beginning of another story – the story of the world here and now?

The narrating and the acting Jan Beneš has lived in his stories for nearly fifty years. When he was in his forties, he made a decision to share with us what he experienced on his journey through Prague and along the lives of his friends, his family, his partners, colleagues and random people he met on his everyday wanderings. In Konec světa, he was a passive observer of the present world, in Pravidla směšného chování, he mainly acts. In Konec světa, he was still living in the gap between the memories of his past and the present world. In Pravidla směšného chování, he finds his 'now' and he tries to live it. Here, he is not a son anymore but a grown-up man who decided to face his life the way it is:

‘(...) The water is still, medium-dense, bland.

I'm plunging, I'm diving, I'm swimming under the water-level. I'm opening my eyes. I'm peering at my face. It's a horrible spectacle but it's still much better than to see nothing.'

[‘(...)Voda je nehybná, středně hustá, nijaká.

Nořím se do ní, potápím se, plavu pod hladinou. Otevírám oči. Dívám se sám sobě zblízka do ksichtu. Je to hrozný pohled, ale pořád mnohem lepší, než nevidět nic.'](PSC: 134)

In Konec světa, Jan Beneš was a critic of Czech society, sceptical to its existence within the post-communist world. In Pravidla směšného chování he accepts it. In spite of the fact that his position of in-betweeners stays unchanged.

6. Emil Hakl - Summary

6.1 Jan (Honza) Beneš

The analysis of Emil Hakl's work has revealed several changes that have occurred in the level of the writer's style as well as in the subject described. We call this subject 'life according to Jan Beneš'. The narrative of Hakl's work is mainly shaped by the single narrating character, the single narrating 'I'. It shifts from the distant past to recent moments and to the present and from the internal thoughts of this narrating character to his observations of the world around him. Yet, the main theme of Hakl's prose stays the same.

The narrating 'I' of most of Hakl's texts is the same man, Jan (Honza) Beneš, whom the reader meets in the Prague streets (un)welcoming the first foreigners who came to Czechoslovakia after the fall of communism and commenting on the arrival of a capitalist world (Konec světa). It is the same Honza who struggles with the loss of his girlfriend, Petruše, and his inability to participate in the life of mainstream society and the new post-communist politics and economy (Intimní schránka Sabriny Black), the same man who argues with his father (O rodičích a dětech), who wanders through the alienated world of the city of Prague (O létajících objektech), who escapes from reality into exotic places, drugs and words (Let čarodějnice), who thinks about his mother (Let čarodějnice) and who speaks with his dying father (Pravidla směšného chování).

Beneš's world reflects the world of a person who has spent his youth under communism and under the decades of Czechoslovak 'normalization'. There, he chooses the lifestyle of an individual living on the periphery of Czechoslovak society, being involved with the country's socialist politics as little as possible. He retains the attitude of a detached observer when living in the post-communist system but, this time, he acts as a person who is not completely against the system but stands somewhere in between. He is a person who is always partly 'in' (accepting mainstream, capitalism and the consumerist society) and always partly 'out' (behaving as an outcast and as an outsider). Honza Beneš is always on the move between being almost a successful person and being a failure, not only in his career but also in his personal relationships. His attitude towards the current state of affairs is mostly critical. Only with advancing age and the passing of time does Honza's attitude gradually change towards recognition of the present. Protest against the system which Honza expressed in his teenage years and his early adulthood slowly loses its power as he becomes more and more tolerant towards the society that surrounds him. But his strong criticism never disappears completely as it is in his nature to look at the world and at himself critically and never as a member of an unthinking mass of people.

From this point of view, the series of literary texts by Emil Hakl can be seen as the narrator's record of his own psychological process of adaptation (or perhaps a failure to adapt) to the previous communist regime and to the contemporary post-communist world.

6.2 An image of society

In all his works, Emil Hakl takes us close to the society of lonely people who find their adaptation to the principles of the world in which they live extremely difficult. His key characters are ordinary and extraordinary people, who come from different generations, represent varying values but still have one thing in common – they experience solitude and confusion and are threatened by mental breakdown as they struggle to cope. Their lives are zigzagging journeys between triumphs and defeats, between partial successes and repeated failures. They are seekers of personal stability and love but often find chaos and grief. It turns out that the world they live in is complicated and more hostile than they could ever imagine. The communist regime did not make their lives happy. Capitalism does not make them happy either. The generation of older people does not see anything overtly positive in the democratic openness of the country. They reject it for its focus on consumerism and on a multiplicity of options that, according to them, brings only chaos and indecisiveness into people's lives. They also cannot cope with the confusion which the new post-communist society created in its value system. They hide themselves in their personal memories and in chatting about seemingly unimportant but constant things. The generation of their sons (mid-age generation) survives on alcohol, in temporary employment, in temporary relationships and in nostalgia for their anti-regime, underground lifestyle which some of them led in their youth and which made their youth, in their eyes, socially and politically worthwhile. Finally, there is the generation of young people. These are also lost in the ferocity and aggression of the adult world that surrounds them. They cope with the new world in their own way: they become either fast and furious participants in the activities of the new era, or they fall by the wayside, depressed.

The world of losers, loners and freaks, in the works by Emil Hakl, is contrasted with the world of enthusiastic individuals, businessmen and their obedient employees, successful directors, musicians and filmmakers. As the narrating Beneš looks at losers, loners and freaks with love, with compassion and with dismay, he sees the other ones as a bunch of naïve, hypocritical and careerist individuals who exchanged the real for a life of pretension. In Beneš's view, the Czech society he describes is full of both types of people: of idealistic and careerist yuppies on the one hand and of depressed young people on the other; of disappointed, scared and confused adults on the one hand and of successful and aggressive businessmen on the other; of sceptical old men on the one hand and of contented people on the other. Jan Beneš stands always in between. He is an alien in all these worlds. He is a critical but also a respectful observer of a society which has gone through a political, economic, social and cultural transition. He faces the victorious capitalism and seeks new recognition, stability and love. In the newly found freedom, it is difficult for Jan Beneš as well as for other Hakl's members of Czech society to find these values. From this point of view, the series of literary texts by Emil Hakl can also be seen as the narrator's record of a psychological process of adaptation of Czech society to the previous communist regime and, later, to the contemporary post-communist world. .

6.3 An image of the 'real' world

In the majority of Hakl's works, the narrative is subjected to one, single narrating personality. This personality is Jan Beneš. The character of Jan Beneš is Hakl's main actor and the main narrating 'I' of most of his stories. Jan Beneš is also the real personality that lies behind each text written by the pseudonym, Emil Hakl.

The reality in which Jan Beneš-the character lives, which Jan Beneš-the narrator shapes and Jan Beneš-the writer experiences carries information which we are free to compare with our own perception of the real world. Throughout the narratives of Hakl's works, we follow the image of Czech communist and post-communist society, we learn about existing places, about authentic political, social and cultural events and about authentic representatives of the contemporary world. The autobiographical inspiration of Hakl's texts is indisputable. However, it is only one of many sources that play a part in each construction of Hakl's fictive-real. Hakl's perception of the real world functions as a point of departure for the construction of Jan Beneš's-the narrator's account of a fictive-real world. This fictive-real world then functions as a point of departure for the reader's perception of Hakl's text in relation to both the real and the fictive world.

The series of literary texts by Emil Hakl can also be seen as the author's and the reader's record of a psychological process of adaptation of Jan Beneš-the author and of the real Czech society to the previous communist regime and to the contemporary post-communist system. From this point of view, everything that has been said about the narrator and about his perception of the world can be seen as a critical reflection of the real world in a work of fiction.

6.4 Contemporary, realistic and postmodern

The world which the narrative of Haki's texts constructs combines both the vertical and the horizontal perspective. It responds to the linear time flow (the actual flow of Jan Beneš's life) and to the characters' memories (the cyclic time). It is fragmented as it incorporates the observations and thoughts of individuals and their actions and it is complex as these observations and thoughts are centralized by the single narrating character of Jan Beneš. It is articulate in the way it describes different characters, situations and events, and silent in the way it does not speak about certain things. It is chaotic in an individual's erratic actions and thoughts but it also conforms to the order of human life and respects it. It is deconstructive, depressive and critical in its relationship with the outside world and the self, but it is also understanding towards all human imperfections. It admires the variety of human natures as well as it laughs at them. It is ambiguous, versatile and elusive, yet it despises it.

Haki's narrative connects the world of the real (authentic) with the world of fantasy and imagination. It follows a single story of a man and yet it spreads in many directions and spheres. It is highly subjective and yet it plays with objectivising views. In its description of the world, it acts realistic and yet it is also multidimensional and postmodern.

From this point of view, the series of literary texts by Emil Haki can be seen as the author's/the narrator's/the reader's postmodern and post-modern record of the psychological process of adaptation of real Czech society to the communist regime and later to the post-communist system. It is a society which is wandering along the streets of Verne's Steel Town and through the labyrinth of the Quake and the Cthulhu. It is a society which is struggling to find a way out of a Kafkaesque alienated world. It is a society which waits to free itself from sci-fi visions of the apocalypse and of glossy magazines, billboards and TV programmes but cannot. It is society which found itself in the narratives of the others but, in actions, it stays indecisive and stagnant. It is society in which every individual seeks recognition of the self, in which every individual is ridiculed as well as accepted.

'Life according to Jan Beneš' is an individual's perception of the world of today and yet it arises from the contemporary Czech world. It is a story of Czech society seen through the eyes of a middle-aged man, a writer, who grew up on the periphery of the communist system and who has struggled in his search for a stable place within the post-communist system. This man is Haki's embodiment of Czech society and this man is confused.

II. The constructed and deconstructed world of Jan Balabán's fiction

Introduction

Unlike the writing by Emil Hakl, Balabán's texts are built up of personal stories of various individuals whose lives go separate ways but sometimes touch in the most common way such as within a family bond, love or a friendship. Balabán offers a variety of individuals' narratives. Some of these narratives are introduced only once and within the confines of a single collection or a novel. Some of them extend beyond a single story or single volume and re-appear in a series of other texts.

Balabán's texts expand on several themes as well as on individual characters. To deal with both aspects in full, Balabán's works will be analyzed from two different perspectives. One will concentrate on the themes and motifs as they appear and re-appear in the lives of individual characters within single texts, single volumes and in the whole context of Balabán's fiction. This type of analysis will follow certain topics which are repeatedly discussed in connection with individuals' life experiences, the variations in these topics and the forms and the frequency with which certain events intervene in the lives of each character. In addition, the work will also focus on the nature of certain characters and on their transformation within various stages of their personal existence.

The first chapter of the analysis will establish the way Balabán's work is constructed. It will consider certain principles that shape the structure of these texts and points out certain changes these texts have formally implied in the course of their creation. It will discuss the narratorial perspective, the position of the narrator and the way the text influences the reader's perception of both the fictive and the real. This will set the ground for a semantic exploration of Balabán's works. The main analysis will be divided into two major parts: one will follow the collective (social) experience of Balabán's characters; the other will follow their individual experiences. It will touch upon the individual's position within the outside world and upon the individual's perception of the self within the self. The analysis will reveal the parameters of Balabán's fictive reality which his characters keep exploring and which the reader of Balabán's universe perceives and relates to the world he or she knows best – the reality he or she lives.

The following are Balabán's texts I will examine: the collection of stories, Středověk (Middle Ages, 1995, henceforth ST), Boží lano (God's Rope, 1998, henceforth BL) and Prázdniny (Holidays, 1998, henceforth PR), the novel, Černý beran (The Black Ram, 2000, henceforth CB), the novel, Kudy šel anděl (Where the Angel Walked, 2003, henceforth KSA), the collections of stories, Možná že odcházíme (Maybe We Are Leaving, 2004, henceforth MO) and Jsme tady (We Are Here, 2006, henceforth JT), the novel, Zeptej se táty (Ask Your Dad, 2010, henceforth ZT) and some unpublished short stories collected in Povídky (Collection of short stories, 2010). I will leave aside Balabán's graphic novel, Srdce draka (The Heart of the Dragon, 2001), his theatre plays, Posedlí (Crazies, 2006) and Bezruč?! (Bezruč?!, 2009) and his journalistic and essayistic work because non-prose works are out with the scope of my analysis.

1. A few words on the narration and genres

1.1 Narration. Interplay of narratorial perspectives.

There are several narratorial tendencies in Balabán's writing. The first one is represented by the changes in the narration and by the perspective each character, through whom we perceive individual stories, applies while reflecting on the world. In his prose debut, Středověk, Balabán has already introduced three types of narration – the character-bound narrator, speaking to us from the first person perspective, the character-bound focalizer, speaking to us from the third person perspective, and the external narrator. In Boží lano, he experimented with opportunities offered by the narrating character speaking to us from the first person perspective only. In all the other texts written and published thereafter, the narrating character is again speaking to us either from the first person perspective (e. g. František Josef: CB, Emil: MO, ZT) or from the third person perspective (majority of Balabán's characters), or the writer combines both perspectives (e. g. CB). An accompanying voice of an external narrator is the essential complement to both.

The narrating character of Balabán's texts can be a man, a woman or a child. It is either a single narrating character, two alternating characters – a man and a man (Hans and Emil in Balabán's last three works), a man and a woman (Roman and Uršula in 'Uršula': MO) or a woman and a child (Magda and Jaromír in 'Magda': MO), or several people who share their experiences and their views within a single narrative (KSA). Whenever a story allows or requires this, all three male, female and child's perspectives used in Balabán's works are applied and do so in equal terms. Male and female perspectives are considered with sensitivity to their gender and in detail. Narrating female characters do not lack their passion and their expression does not lose its power and strength. In content, in style and in depth, they fully complement their males, giving them their own feminine – rational and emotional – version of things. Only in numbers, Balabán's male perspective prevails. After all, the male perspective is the one which is natural to the author himself. The female perspective is used here to provide the defamiliarizing perspective of men; it is used here to provide a counterbalance to the male world.

The child's perspective is, on the other hand, applied only occasionally in Balabán's works (e.g. 'Hořící dítě', 'Magda': MO). Generally speaking, the child's perspective in literature is commonly used when a defamiliarizing view has to be provided on a serious issue. Sometimes it is also used in order to avoid external or internal censorship, or when something is rather difficult or traumatic to express. In Balabán's works, the child perspective appears as a contrast to the world of adults, as a journey of innocence and big and curious eyes, a journey for discovery of the world yet with no worries about their life and about their future selves. In Balabán's works, the child's world is still a game, fantasy, imagination. Its focus lies in moving forward only. It is a one-way road. As opposed to this, the adult's world is seen as a crossroad leading in many directions, in and out, back and forth and in circles.

Overall, we may say that the reality of Balabán's fiction is an encounter of real (adult) worlds and those which are imagined (child) as well as an encounter of rationally and emotionally thinking and acting human beings, men and women. It is a world in which none of the actors is preferred or suppressed, in which none of the truths is claimed to be the only one. It is a world of perspectives and multiple truths – male, female, and child's.

Balabán does not play with a male-female and adult-child vision of the world only but also with various positions individual characters hold within the narrated world. So it happens that, in Balabán's collections of stories, one person acts as the narrating character of several texts (Pavel Nedostál or Ivan Satinský: PR; Emil, Hans or Kateřina in Balabán's last three works) or as the narrating character of a single story. In Balabán's novels, the situation is similar. There are three narrating characters in Černý beran (František Josef, Patricie and Jennifer) and even ten narrating characters in Kudy šel anděl. Some of them take the opportunity to speak on more occasions, others speak only once. Both in Balabán's short stories and in his novels, it also applies that a character who also acts as the narrating character of one particular story becomes, later, one of many non-narrating characters in the other text, and vice versa.

Those characters who narrate on more than one occasion function as both centralizing and decentralizing points of the story – they construct and at the same time they deconstruct the story. Most of the short stories introduce a single narrating character. This character is then a centralizing point of the story. However, if this narrating character appears in a number of stories included in one collection or in the whole series (or in the novel), then he/she functions as both: a decentralizing point of the story the whole collection or the whole series (and the novel) unfolds because he/she is a carrier of only one of many truths the text offers and, at the same time, he/she acts as a centralizing point exactly because he/she tightens the structure of the text by his/her repeated appearance in the scene. (The same applies for non-narrating characters.) As a result, the structure of Balabán's works is through his characters being constantly broken and constantly built.

The changing perspective of narration has also a strong influence on the reader's perception of Balabán's fictive world – it opens up a world of various interpretations and meanings. A testimony provided by one individual is never clear as it is often fragmented and often interrupted by the views of other people. An individual's truth is questioned by a variety of other individuals who adjust it according to their own perception of the world. Single characters become the narrators of their own lives, the readers of lives of others and the objects of someone else's narration. They access reality that cannot be fully discovered because it consists of multiple meanings and subjective truths. They explore their own behaviour, their feelings and their minds. What they find they apply to their present lives. They submerge themselves in their own selves and through these selves they question their relationships to certain people and things.

Experiments with different types of narration set Balabán's texts on two paths. The first path is leading alongside the characters presenting themselves in the first person perspective (as character-bound narrators) or in the third person perspective (as character-bound focalizers). The second path involves the position of the external narrator.

In general, in the narratives with the first person perspective, the character-bound narrator functions as the reader's guide. He/she is "showing" us what is happening in the story as well as, and most importantly, he/she is also "telling" us about it and about himself/herself in it. He/she constructs the story as well as controls what is happening there. Through his/her subjective 'I' and his/her subjective powers, this narrator is able to influence the reader's own personal view and so change his/her opinion on things. From the wider scope, the first person perspective also suggests that there may be a certain degree of identity/resemblance between the narrator and the author's own personality. As a result, the reader may think that the picture such narrator draws is not only his own picture but also the author's own vision of the world.

As opposed to it, with the narration in the third person perspective, the reader does not have to feel that certain opinions and certain truths are imposed on him/her. This is because the third person perspective is a personalized testimony that does not rely on a strong subjective 'I' of the speaking character. Rather, the reader is looking at the story with the distance of a spectator and, at the same time, as the one who follows the lives of the characters in their immediate presence – through the character's actions and their minds. By this, the third person perspective supports the reader's freedom to choose the way he/she reads the text, he/she feels about the text and he/she understands the text. It provides him/her with an opportunity to make his/her own independent judgment about the presented fictive reality without being subordinated by the strong subjective 'I' or an external narrator. The third person perspective also reflects the writer's and so the narrator's decision to separate his subjective 'I' from the fictive reality of his works. By doing so, Balabán enables his texts to act as independent constructs of human life, detached from his own experience of the world.

As we have already mentioned, from all Balabán's works, it is only Boží lano which is narrated solely by the internal narrator and from the first person perspective ('I was thinking about you when I was still a little boy.' ['Myslel jsem na tebe, když jsem byl ještě chlapec'] (BL: 7). All other works are either and mainly presented by the characters in the third person perspective (CB) or they combine both (MO). To complement both, these works are also presented by the external narrator. Here, the external narrator appears as an entity that prepares the reader for the entrance of the narrating characters:

'Magda sits down on the plastic chair left here by the previous tenant. She lights a cigarette and crouches into her own private space limited by her shoulders and knees, collar bones, small breasts, laps and arms. This is my home. Here, I will make a bed for you, my little boy. She smokes and cries a bit.'

['Magda si sedne na plastickou židli, kterou tu nechal předchozí nájemník. Zapálí si cigaretu a celá se schoulí do intimního prostoru ohraničeného ramený a koleny, klíčními kostmi, malými prsy, klínem a pažemi. Tady jsem doma. Tady ti ustelu postýlku, chlapečku. Kouří a trochu brečí.'] (MO: 22) and also the entity that controls the space between the narration of one character and the narration of another one:

'Katka sees very clearly how the evening night drops away and shrinks like a transparent bag with infusion until there is nothing left inside and the new bag has not been provided yet. Now, for a little while it feels like in the Sleeping Beauty... It's morning again... Bowl, then breakfast, which Katka will not eat anyway, pills, injections... Why us? Why it has to be our daughter? Katka's father stopped in the mezzanine.'

['Katka přesně vidí, jak večerní noc odkapává a smršťuje se jako průhledný sáček infuze, až v něm není nic a novou ještě nenapíchlí. Teď na malou chvíli je to jako v pohádce o Šípkové Růžence... A už je ráno... Mísa, pak snídane, kterou Katka stejně nebude jíst, léky, injekce... Proč zrovna my, proč zrovna naše holka? Katčin otec s zastavil na odpočívadle schodiště.'] (MO: 257)

Balabán's external narrator does not provide the reader with his/her own critical view of the world he/she narrates. Balabán's external narrator solely observes. By doing this, he/she acts as an objective self rather than as a strong subjective personality directing all.

Considering the subject of Balabán's narratives, the interchange of narratorial perspectives in his works may suggest one thing: firstly, the author's effort to separate his own personality from the personality of his characters so that these characters act as human beings, independent of the author's own self (using third person perspective/external narrator); secondly, the author's inability or unwillingness to separate his own self from the reality of his works (using first person perspective as a testimony of his life). Consequently, this interchange may also suggest that, in the case of Balabán's works, we deal with fiction which contains certain elements of autobiographical writing, or at least that Balabán's works are based on a constant play on testimonial and scenic narration, on 'I' and 'it' and on the subjective self and objective others – unable to be with one and without the other.

The combination of various types of narration – the strong voice of the character-bound narrator/focalizer and a rather quiet voice of the external narrator has also another outcome – it shows the world as a place of fragmented reality and multiple truths. This is also and particularly supported by another factor. This factor is the application of multiple narrations – the narrations in which two or more characters look at the same relationship, the same situation or the same event from their own perspectives (e. g. František Josef and Patricie: CB, Uršula and Roman: PR). To quote Kubíček, multiple narrations have 'a special ability to shake the identity of the fictive world by pointing out their individual and legitimate truths. The fictive truth becomes a subjective construct with only a temporal validity [zvláštní schopnost znejistit identitu fikčního světa tím, že poukází na jeho individuální platnost. Fikční pravda se ukazuje jako subjektivní, dočasně platný konstrukt]' (Kubíček 2007: 136). In other words, multiple narrations break the one, single truth into a certain number of individuals' truths and by this they create the picture of the world which is not absolute but multidimensional and floating (temporal). Then, to bring this fragmented testimony into the unity is not a responsibility of Balabán's characters but the responsibility of the reader. The reader is the unifying element of Balabán's texts with multiple personal narrations. This is because, in these texts, there is no one else who could be trusted. In these texts, every character is reliable and unreliable at the same time. His/her own projection of the self is either parallel to or in conflict with other people's perception of his/her identity. His/her projection of others is different from other characters' projection of themselves and others.

In reality, for each individual the world is a matter of subjective truth, but the world is full of individuals and their truths. In consequence, the overall world is uncertain, fragmented, but multidimensional and rich. And Balabán's fictive world is no exception. Accordingly, it is deprived of its simple clarity and its simple truth and replaced with uncertainty about the recognition of human life and, at the same time, with the vast diversity and the diverse beauty of human life. In Balabán's texts, each truth – the author's, the narrator's and the reader's – is being questioned, constantly integrated with other truths and destroyed. Hence, it makes both the real and the fictive worlds multidimensional and alive, yet insistent.

How this works, we will see in the main analysis of Balabán's texts below.

1.2 The real and the fictive

A few paragraphs above, it was noted that, by application of the character-bound narration to his texts, Jan Balabán separates his subjectivity from the fictive reality of his works and enables them to act as independent constructs of human life. We have also suggested that this separation is happening on the level of the narrative discourse. On the level of the story itself, this separation is not so straightforward. There, the writer and the story of his characters find some common ground. Certainly, we can say so if we look at Balabán's life. We can examine various interviews he gave to the Czech media about his literary fiction or we can take into account all that Balabán's family and their closest friends have said about Jan Balabán, for example, in the work, Honzo, ahoj! Setkání s Janem Balabánem (Bye, Honza! An Encounter with Jan Balabán, henceforth AH) published posthumously in memory of Jan Balabán in 2011. In this work, various people who had a chance to know Jan Balabán have published their memories and reflections about him and his testimony about the world. It is also here where we, the readers, learn more about certain episodes, images and thoughts that have helped to shape Balabán's life and later, as it seems, also his literary world. Here, we find out about Jan Balabán's close relationship with his brother artist, Daniel (Žila 2011: AH: 39), about his father, Daniel, a medical doctor, and his feelings about the family's moving to Ostrava (Klobása 2011: AH: 27), about Balabán's daughter and her diabetes (Surůvka 2011: AH: 62), about Balabán's Canadian adventure and about the visit he paid to Bohouš Čermák, an atypical Czech emigrant living in Toronto with his wife Jenny (Březina 2011: AH: 78), about Balabán's difficulties with alcohol (Šnajdr jr 2011: AH: 107), about his internal struggles and his prevailing feeling of being an outsider, a loser and an outcast (Voglová 2011: AH: 91) and about the people's view on Balabán's writing (Šimsa 2011: AH: 65, Chrobák 2011: AH: 119).

Comparing the above examples with Balabán's fiction, we may see that an artistic brother, Daniel, is mentioned in Boží lano and later also he can be recognized in the character of Emil (MO, JT) or Hans (ZT)⁶⁰; a hospital environment builds a scenery for the novel Kudy šel anděl but also for some other short stories (e. g. 'Hořící dítě': MO); Balabán's daughter can be recognized in the character of Kateřina in the last three Balabán's works; Bohouš Čermák becomes the uncle Bogomil in the novel Černý beran; Ostrava is the place where most of Balabán's works unfold; the majority of Balabán's characters have problems with alcohol and with loneliness.

The existence of certain links between Balabán's works and Balaban's life has also been discussed by other Balabán's colleagues and friends. Šimsa states that, behind Balabán's individual characters, there is a real person made of flesh and blood whom Jan Balabán has met (Šimsa 2011: AH: 65). Klobása argues that Balabán's stories are full of things Balabán knew very well; that they are about his family, about the church, about the city he inhabited, about his religious faith and theology (Klobása 2011: AH: 27). Additionally, the writer himself admitted that his works were inspired by his own life. However, he also said that this way of writing changed in his novel Kudy šel anděl when he, for the first time, realized that he did not have to write all the time just about himself. He is convinced that in this book he finally managed to get out and meet other people and asked questions not only about the meaning of his own life but also about the life we live here or we have been living here (Chrobák 2011: AH: 119).

From all the above notes, it follows that Balabán is another writer who used his life experience as a source of inspiration for his literary works. Yet, there is no doubt that the work he left behind is still a fiction. It is a picture Balabán constructed from his own memory and his imagination. However, it is also a picture of Balabán's own life and the world he himself lived in and learned to recognize – the world of his family, his friends and other people living in his proximity that somehow affected him. We may say that, for Balabán's fiction, the real world is an inspiration and for Balabán's real world, the fiction is a means of understanding it.

⁶⁰ In Možná že odcházíme and in Jsme tady, Hans is described as a writer. In Zeptej se táty, it is Emil who is described as a writer. In this novel, Hans is an artist – painter. Otherwise, characteristics of both individuals seem unchanged.

1.3 In between short stories and novels

Another aspect that shapes the structure and the testimony of Balabán's fiction is related to the genre of his works. It is clear from his listed literary oeuvre that Balabán was always struggling between the genre of short stories and the genre of novels – he produced five collections of short stories, three novels and one graphic novel. To address this, he states that the foundations of his poetics lies on the tension between an individual story and the so called grand narrative. He says that he writes short stories because he feels that a short story is possibly the best narrative instrument for these hectic times when people meet each other only briefly and constantly in a rush. However, he also says that he is interested in individual stories exactly because he wants to find out whether it is possible to merge these individual stories of unknown and ordinary people into a larger unit that would represent 'a really essential supra-individual event' ['skutečně podstatnou nadindividuální událost'] (Balabán: Balašík: Reichel 2004: Host, vol. 8: 5-9).

In Balabán's works, this tension between short stories and novels is always present. To minimize the genre distinction, Balabán tries to create links between individual stories from a particular collection – by introducing the same characters in a number of the stories, or between his short stories and some of his novels – by re-introducing the characters from his individual short stories in the novels. The former happens in every collection of short stories by Balabán (for instance, in the case of Pavel Nedostál and Ivan Satinský: PR), the latter happens in three of his latest works (in the case of Emil, Hans, Kateřina) both within the frame of a single volume and in the sequence of all the three works. As a result of this linking effort, the narrative structure of a book of short stories acts similar to that of a novel or a series of novels.

The second method to blur the difference between both genres has led the author to act in the opposite direction – to go from the novel to the short story. As we will see below, Balabán's novels are subject to fragmentation. They are split up into several chapters and several personal narrations. Each narration acts individually and also behaves as if it were material related to a larger unit. This principle is applied in all the three novels by Balabán (Černý beran, Kudy šel anděl and Zeptej se táty). Boží lano is somewhere between a short story and a novel. Although frequently classified as a short story, the same narrator links his memories and thoughts into a linear but fragmented flow of time.

To sum up, Balabán's fiction is governed by several important principles. The ambiguity of his texts is formally and in content realized by means of tension, which arises from the variety of different perspectives, from the tension between the fictive and the 'real' and as a result of a consistent fragmentation and centralization of individuals' stories and the genres he uses. His texts show the world as unsettled within its structural unity and in each of its individual parts. The texts reflect upon the impossibility of anything absolute and the relativity of all. They play with the author's experience of his own world, yet they are completely fictive.

How these formal principles tie in with the semantic content of Balabán's works and how they participate in the testimony that Balabán's literary fiction provides about the world of today will be the subject of the following analysis.

2. Collective (social) experience

Balabán's works consist of literary sketches which contain a gallery of people whom we meet in various stages of their lives and under various circumstances. Some of the texts are in-depth studies of certain individuals; others are just single stories of single characters and single events but strong personalities.

The narratives of Balabán's literary works are built around individual characters and individual situations that these characters experience at some point during their personal lives. Balabán's characters are seemingly ordinary people who live their seemingly ordinary lives within the environment of communist and post-communist Czechoslovak (Czech) society. They live seemingly routine and (un)interesting lives until the reader meets them in the moment of their personal revelation and breakdown.

2.1 Human relationships and love

One of the main questions which Balabán's characters constantly ask is about the true nature of the human relationship and about the existence of love. In Balabán's works, nearly every character finds himself/herself in a situation when he/she has to deal with his/her own certainty and uncertainty in relation to other people and to life. Balabán's characters experience tolerance and love towards other people as much as they experience misunderstanding, total disagreement, distrust and loss. They think about the human relationship and what it means as they become aware of its delicate nature and as they realize that they failed in their effort to protect it. Balabán's characters attempt to define the nature of the human relationship from their early years, from the time they became aware of their family backgrounds and from the time they started their own search for their first partners, their friends and close human bonds.

2.1.1 Erotic relationships disrupted

Erotic relationships are always complicated in the lives of Balabán's characters. Balabán's characters experience many difficulties before they find their love and, in this love, also their personal peace. Many of them taste disillusionment from their first real relationship. Many of them suffer from personal frustration when they lose everything they have built since their early adulthood and end up hiding in their own solitude and as drunkards. Many of them stagger from one relationship to another or just stand still, scared to try again. Married couples drift apart after several years of living together or they endure the pain their relationship causes them and adapt but sacrifice their own individual desires and needs. Partners split up. Families break down. Old bonds are destroyed; new complicated bonds are created.

The loss of love and a desire for love is one of the most explored and discussed topics in all the texts by Balabán. Nearly all the characters go through the process of defining for themselves what love means for them. They seek answers to why, when and where they lost their love and they try to find new ways to regain it, but often with doubts.

A search for love is one of the most important experiences that determine the way the lives of Balabán's characters unfold. It influences their daily actions and daily thoughts. It is omnipresent and it does not leave anyone aside. Love comes to every individual in a different form and it unfolds differently. For example, in 'Niagarské vodopády' (ST), we are taken in by an unnamed woman, a toilet attendant, who speaks her mind in order to tell us the story of her personal downfall after she lost her love and with love also her chance to be happy. Her misery is connected to the hotel she used to visit with her former lover. Later, the same hotel becomes her source of income when she returns there to work as a toilet attendant. But this time, she is much older, much bigger in shape and very unhappy with everything she does. In 'Proměny' (PR), we are introduced to Doctor Ivan Satinský and to the story of a man who experiences a personal breakdown after he loses his work and, in consequence, also his family that is not willing to accept his new drinking habits. We are also present at his relationship with the younger Taťána. It is a relationship of two survivors when Ivan Satinský is still depressed and unable to get up and live. It is a relationship full of hope when Ivan Satinský finally decides to fight the depression and change his lifestyle into something positive. It is a relationship without hope when Taťána leaves Ivan Satinský due to her fear of his new image which she cannot overcome. Elsewhere, Pavel Nedostál and his wife Dana ('V neděli', 'Silvestr Svinov', 'Prázdniny': PR) are experiencing a crisis in their married life. They live with each other but do not communicate, even for the sake of their children. In contemplation over his lost relationship, Pavel often escapes to the memories of his past or to his children. Dana drinks, lost in her thoughts of their past married life and what remains of it. František Josef (CB) is already divorced when he tries to plan his future with a new partner, Patricie, but this relationship also goes through a series of misunderstandings and breakdowns when both characters seek each other's understanding through the memories of their past. Bogomil (CB) leaves his wife, his femme fatal Johana, forever as he is not able to cope with her extravagant behaviour and her madness anymore. To escape from her power, he flees to Canada and there he starts a new life with a new partner. Yet, he still has to put up with his memories of the past and that brings complications to his new relationship. Eva Topolská (KSA) breaks off her relationship with her teenage boyfriend, Martin Vrána, after she realizes she wants more from life than just dreaming about pure love and pure happiness. Eva never finds love again; all her attempts to find someone else end up in loneliness. Roman Hradílek and his wife Uršula ('Uršula': MO) struggle badly after losing their mutual understanding and trust. Roman escapes from the duties of his family life to a pub and Uršula cries her eyes out in the bathroom. Hans ('Hlas jeho pána': MO, ZT) is divorced, as is his new partner. Both have children from previous relationships and, in their new life together, they struggle to understand each other. Similar patterns can also be observed in the lives of other Balabán's characters.

In Balabán's works, an erotic relationship is always ambiguous and always the concern of at least two different individuals. All the interested parties have an equal chance to talk about their feelings and thoughts of love – men as well as their female counterparts. So we learn, for example, about Jan's ('Výročí svatby': ST) increasing sexual frustration due to the fact that his wife Marie denies him sex. Then we also learn about Marie's fear and disgust which every sign of sexual desire from her husband and anyone at all evokes in her (Ibid.). Another character, Dr Satinský ('Proměny': PR), talks about his life crises and about the personal change he underwent whilst in the relationship with Taťána. Later, it is Taťána ('Balkán': PR) who expresses her sad feelings about Dr Satinský after leaving him. Another character, Pavel Nedostál ('V neděli', 'Silvestr Svinov': PR), considers his marriage to Dana already beyond redemption. All he is capable of is a few unfriendly words and long evenings spent with his friends in a local pub. Dana talks of her loss and emptiness with the great sorrow of a lonely woman who has nothing left but the flat they shared together and children who are slowly becoming independent of her ('Prázdniny': PR). Pavla ('Odpoledne a večer': PR) finds it difficult to cope with the loss of her youth and with the fact that her children have grown up and will leave soon. She longs to be young, attractive and once more to be loved by her husband. However, when she finally decides to approach him, she finds a scared man who pretends to be asleep rather than facing her needs. Karel (Ibid.) recognizes his passivity and a lack of passion for Pavla's body but, instead of making any sort of effort to change it, he hides in his own fantasy and his heroic dreams. In Černý beran, we follow many episodes from František Josef's life and also reflect on his partner's views. Their perspectives are often very different but sometimes they interact in a lively manner:

‘Once more I can hear that cracking, the cracking of the trees which are being bent in the middle of their lives. Josef has become a malicious drunkard! He takes out his moods on me. Why do I have to put up with this? Maybe he isn't even drunk but he isn't sober either. He carries his grudge within himself as if it were a snake. Why can't that female understand that I can't stand this world? Suddenly, it is too much for me, it is like having to queue at some repulsive office, it all multiplies like unsolved problems, divorces, children, the ex-wife, my drugged friends and love made light by pornographically-deviant thoughts. A futile silence. As if I had to hide my hangover from some beastly officials, from children, from disgusting schoolmates.

Am I not a human being? Am I just a container for slop? Yes, people say that women are vessels of sin, but people don't say that it is man's sins which are poured into these vessels. His moods into my vessel. Can I understand what he says, me, a stupid woman out of luck? I could shut up and listen to his words like Maria did at Jesus's feet. But he doesn't speak like Jesus...'

[‘Už zase slyším ten praskot, praskot stromů ohýbaných v polovině života. Už je ten Josef jen poťouchlý opilec! Vybíjí si na mně svoje nálady, a já to mám snášet? Možná ani není opilý, ale střízlivý také není. Nosí to v sobě jako hada.

Copak ta ženská nechápe, že jenom prostě nemůžu vydržet na světě? Je toho na mě moc. Najednou se to zřetězí jako fronta na odporném úřadě, nedotažené trable, rozvody, děti, bývalá žena, zfetovaní kamarádi, úchylné pornograficky zlehklé podoby lásky. Marné mlčení. Jako bych musel skrývat kocovinu před nějakými bestiálními úředníky, před dětmi, před jakýmsi odpornými spolužáky.

A já snad nejsem člověk. Jen nějaká nádoba na splašky. Ano, říká se o ženách, že jsou nádoby hříchu, ale neříká se, že je to mužský hřích, který se do těch nádob nalévá. Do té mé nádoby ty jeho stavy. Copak já tomu můžu rozumět, já blbá ženská, která měla smůlu? Můžu držet hubu a poslouchat jako ta Marie u noh Ježíšových. Kdyby aspoň mluvil jako Ježíš...'] (CB: 70)

As this example shows, the thoughts of both František Josef and Patricie always clash or merge when something important happens or when something important is supposed to be discussed: love, death, childhood, memories, past and present, faith, František's alcoholism and Patricie's illness, God. Both individuals have their own views on these matters. They constantly ask, they constantly quarrel but they also make peace. Patricie cannot stand František's drinking and his lectures on God but she also feels resentful and sad when watching his never-ending search for answers to his past and to his God. František despises Patricie for her seemingly innocent but judging eyes. Despite all their discrepancies, though, both František Josef and Patricie strive for mutual understanding and love and, through their relationship, they also attempt to attain it.

The story of love described in Kudy šel anděl is rather more complicated. There are several characters in this work and most of these characters act as both narrators and objects of narrations. Accordingly, every story introduced in this novel is looked at from different angles.

The narrative of Kudy šel anděl is built around the life of Martin Vrána. The novel follows Martin's life from his teenage years to his adulthood. The narration of Martin's life is linear but with one exception. It starts with chapter 19 and so with a description of Martin's lonely life. Only afterwards it turns back to Martin's teenage years and so to the years before this loneliness.

Martin Vrána is the main narrating character of the novel and the story he tells is the story of his own life. This story is interrupted only when Martin's personal path crosses the path of another strong character. When this happens, the role of the narrator is temporarily passed to that other person – most commonly, it is Eva Topolská (Martin's first love), Ivan Bereza, alias Figura (Martin's acquaintance and rival in love), and Monika Tomská (Martin's late lover). Love is discussed by everyone and on all levels of narration. The relationship between Martin and Eva is the first to be debated. The beginning of their love is connected to Martin and Eva's school years, their talk, their wine drinking sessions and anti-communist views. Young Martin is depicted as a romantic soul with long hair and a hard-rock image, careless about his future. Young Eva represents the pragmatic world. Facing the hostility of the communist regime, they both stand strong and united. In the face of the reality of everyday life, they succumb. And it is the pragmatic Eva who makes the final decision to leave Martin's romantic world behind. She walks away. A few years later, these two characters meet again. A few years later, Eva has already been through several relationships but she stays on her own. Martin remains single for long but then finds himself in personal turmoil. He gets married, divorces and later finds a new partner in young Monika Tomská.

The story of Martin's and Eva's relationship has the most complete shape in the novel. It is examined from both sides equally but also from the position of other characters – Ivan Figura and Monika Tomská. From Eva's pragmatic point of view, her relationship with Martin was nothing more than a romantic dream that could not have continued but remains hidden deep inside their minds forever. From Martin's romantic perspective, the relationship was a fatal love that was wonderful while it lasted but hurt when it came to an end. From Ivan's point of view, it was an unhealthy relationship that could have never succeeded. From Monika's loving point of view, that relationship was only a painful memory that still lies deep within Martin's heart. Each of these characters has his or her own subjective truth about Martin's and Eva's world and none of the truths is superior to another. The views of the characters are as different as each character could be and as such they are presented.

Apart from the examination of Eva's and Martin's relationship, the text examines a number of other erotic relationships and none of them is completely innocent and happy: between Eva and Ivan Figura, Martin Vrána and Monika, Mr Vrána and Mrs Vránová (Martin's parents) and Ester Tomská (Monika's sister) and her girl-friend, Pavla. All these relationships have their own significant place and value in the structure and the reality of the whole text. They are relationships based on sexual attraction and emotional distance (Eva, Ivan), on salvation (Martin, Monika), on dependence (Vrána's family) and on mutual understanding between two women (Ester, Pavla). Apart from the last mentioned, no relationship listed above is without problems. Monika and Martin are plagued by the burden of their past experience that complicates their way to happiness. For Eva and Ivan, it is the lack of emotional connection that prevents them from coming near each other. Vrána's parents are unable to communicate normally after many years living with each other. It is only the relationship that joins together the two women, the two people of the same gender, that does not have any negative aspects.

All the stories about relationships in Kudy šel anděl have a similar structure: apart from Pavla, every character is given his or her own narrative voice; everyone expresses his or her feelings, thoughts and opinions. Everyone comments on what is momentarily happening around him/her and everyone reacts to it.

Balabán's three other works – Možná že odcházíme, Jsme tady and Zeptej se táty – deal with the same issues concerning relationship and, again, they apply the double-sided narration. The difficulties that Balabán's couples have to overcome if they want to save their relationship or create a new one are again many. Once again, they arise from a lack of understanding, from the characters' obsession with their own personalities and their own problems and from their incapacity to change anything and adapt to others. Some characters test their relationships throughout the whole period of their mid-life crisis. They question themselves and the people around them; they worry about themselves, and, as a result, mess up their lives. The relationship of Roman Hradílek and Uršula ('Uršula': MO) falls to pieces and survives only on the basis of a mutual passive sufferance. Roman learns how to ignore Uršula's unhappy eyes and her reproaches but suffers with every look at her tired manner. Uršula learns how to blank Roman's supposed infidelity but deeply suffers when buying condoms for his supposed lovers – something she has decided to do when she felt resentful and empty. The same kind of silence surrounds the relationship of the successful photographer, Bednář, and his partner, a singer and a rising star ('Kolotoč':

MO). Here, the problematic situation is the result of uncertainty and the different views held by both partners regarding their future life. They find themselves unable to answer the most ‘basic’ question – should they have children or should they devote themselves to their careers?

‘The world will become a barren belly where there is a plenty of space for anything but there is no place for them to snuggle up to each other. The bed is no longer a nest but an airport, an international airport, where each of them takes off for a different destination. With wobbly knees, each of them, now unfaithful, thinks of a little happiness, but this time with someone else.’

[‘Svět se stane jalovým břichem, kde je dost místa pro cokoli ale není koutku k přitulení. Postel už není hnízdem, ale letištěm, a zrovna tím mezinárodním, kde každý na jiném konci startuje jiným směrem. Každý nevěrný s rozklepanými koleny myslí na ten kousek štěstí s někým jiným.’] (MO: 37)

Bednář’s relationship is a desperate metaphor of human desolation in the world where there is no space for pure love. The desire to have children and to found a family on the one hand and the fear of losing their freedom, independence and career on the other lies between both characters as a burden and, finally, it leads to the total destruction of their relationship.

Sometimes, the relationships which Balabán’s texts describe are disrupted due to personal misunderstanding; sometimes it is a result of a sexual dissatisfaction between partners. Jan and Marie (‘Výročí svatby’: ST) are not able to sustain their marriage because the sexual frustration that they have both felt and not talked about for many years becomes suddenly unbearable. Or elsewhere, one day Karel and Pavla (‘Odpoledne a večer’: PR), a rather contented married couple, reach the point when they are at a loss with what to do about their sexual life. Their children are growing up and Pavla feels there is something missing in her life now. As an ageing woman, she becomes aware of her womanhood and once more she desires to be physically loved and have another child. Her husband Karel, lulled by the comfort and the certainty of his marriage, finds her new sexual requirements abnormal. Rather than attempting to satisfy her, he either pretends to be asleep or falls asleep completely, dreaming of another world.

Relationships also end when external circumstances create insurmountable obstacles for the couple. Ivo and Ema, two fictive heroes in Johana’s story (CB), are frustrated in love when Ivo is sent to participate in a space mission to save the planet and civilisation. Their love ends up lost in the vast space of the universe. Ivo never returns. Hana’s and Ludvík’s (‘Viadačka’: JT) young love languishes when Hana decides to leave the country. The relationship between Monika Tomská and Martin Vrána (KSA) is almost finished by Martin's accident when he is hit by a passing car.

Sometimes, it is death that destroys the relationship between two individuals. Dr Satinský's aunt, Natálie ('Natálie': PR), goes insane after losing her lover during the war. Světlana ('Světlana': JT) loses her husband on holiday when he drowns in an attempt to save the life of their daughter. Marta Nedomová (ZT) remains alone when her husband Jan dies after a long illness.

2.1.2 The history of love - revealed and unrevealed

As it is apparent from all the above examples, in the lives of Balabán's characters, an existing erotic relationship is almost always unhappy or doubtful. It is often shaken or breaks down. This happens for various reasons. In the majority of cases, these reasons arise from the indifference of each individual as well as from their age. Balabán's women and Balabán's men act differently from each other as do people who come from different backgrounds and different generations. Attempts to reach understanding are difficult. This is a matter of concern and results in emotional turmoil.

A large number of Balabán's characters, especially men, marry young. Most of them have a family and children but, when they reach their forties or mid-forties, they doubt their marriage and then they divorce. The explanation of the reasons that have led to their decision to live separately from their partners or to divorce is fragmented. It is provided only in connection with certain individuals. Sometimes, the author offers a single fact and uses it to build a new narrative line. So, while we know of various reasons that have led to the breakdown of the relationship between Johana and Bogomil (CB) or Pavel Nedostál and Dana ('V neděli', 'Silvestr Svinov', 'Prázdniny': PR), we can only guess at what happened in the past love life of Emil Nedoma (MO) or in the relationship of his sister Kateřina (JT, ZT). When Emil first appears on the scene ('Emil': MO), he already carries the burden of his past and struggles to cope with it now; the same it is with his sister Kateřina ('Mléčná dráha': JT). For some of the characters, the most significant thing that happens in their life in relation to 'love' is their first love (Martin Vrána: KSA). For some, the most significant experience is the first signs that indicate the end of their love (Pavel Nedostál and Dana in 'V neděli', 'Silvestr Svinov', 'Prázdniny': PR, or Roman Hradílek and Uršula in 'Uršula': MO). Some of the characters are trapped in thoughts of escape (Bogomil: CB, Karel in 'Odpoledne a večer': PR). Others concentrate on the preservation of their love (František Josef and Patricie: CB). Some live in remorse (Taťána in 'Balkán':

PR, Jonáš in ‘Denatur’ and ‘Ptakoještř’: ST) while others are in raptures over their new love (Emil: ZT).

All Balabán’s characters experience different aspects or stages of love – an exciting love, a love full of pain and a love filled with doubt and fears. They all experience the different ways in which love arrives and disappears. Sometimes love is exchanged for pain (see the relationship of Martin Vrána and Eva Topolská: KSA). Sometimes love overcomes pain (Martin Vrána and Monika Tomská: KSA) and sometimes it is destroyed by doubt, though occasionally it has the strength to conquer doubt (see the relationship of František Josef and Patricie: CB).

Because of their emotional instability, Balabán’s characters lose many things during their lives. They struggle for love and their relationships. Only when there is nothing left do some of them finally find love. Older men attain their personal happiness with younger women and younger women find their security in relationships with older men: Pavel Nedostál meets Jeny (‘Moving into the universe...’, ‘Lední medvěd Telecomu’: PR), Martin Vrána finds Monika Tomská (KSA), Jaromír befriends Lenka (‘Triceratops’: MO) and Emil Nedoma goes out with Jeny (ZT). Elsewhere, it is not a young person but a different environment that brings characters together. Bogomil (CB) builds a new life with a Canadian woman, Jennifer, and Johana’s fictive hero, Ivo (CB), starts a new family on the planet where he lands after the destruction of his own planet.

2.1.4 To sum up: love, relationships and society

What kind of image of society is provided by Balabán’s work? Each character has serious problems with relationships. People marry, divorce and sometimes find a new partner among people from very different generations. People in relationships with persons from the same age group often experience substantial difficulties and often decide to leave. The only relationships that seem to work are between older men and younger women, between two people of the same gender, and between men and women from different countries. Only a few marriages manage to overcome personal problems and survive; most collapse.

Amongst all of Balabán’s characters, the most common reasons for the decision to divorce or separate are lack of personal understanding, different views on life, burnt-out feelings of love and alcoholism (Jonáš in ‘Denatur’, ‘Ptakoještř’: ST, Dr Satinský in ‘Proměny’, ‘Pilot’: PR, Emil in ‘Emil’: MO, ‘Tchoř’: JT). Balabán’s married couples live together until their children grow up enough to understand the difficulties of human relationship. Then the parents fight and, as a result, often separate. Marriages without children do not last either. Such marriages are fatal and destructive for both partners (Jan and Marie in ‘Výročí svatby’: ST, Johana and Bogomil: CB, Bednářs’ family in ‘Kolotoč’: MO) as, even in these marriages, the thought of having children always arises and, as such, it also causes nightmares to those who decided otherwise. Love that brings two young people together does not survive the arrival of pragmatic adulthood.

In Balabán’s fiction, love is the most important emotion and yet it is never certain. People feel they have to search for love in spite of many difficulties but only sometimes do they find it. But where do these difficulties Balabán’s characters have with relationships come from? They seem to lie in the characters’ personal uncertainty and doubting. Difficulties stem from people’s indifference, lack of understanding and lack of will to understand, lack of faith, alcoholism and obsession with their fears and their careers. Relationships break down because Balabán’s characters refuse to assume responsibility for their own lives and for those of others. They constantly doubt and, in doubting, they forget to live and love.

Balabán’s characters define their attitude to their environment through love – both in the sense of an erotic relationship but also in terms of respect for family and friends. In Balabán’s fiction, one of the most discussed relationships is the relationship between children and their parents. People think of their parents at the time of a personal crisis or when they look for an explanation of their doubts and personal fears. The uncertainty they experience in these days makes them go back to their past and reassess all the landmark events in their lives that may have shaped their personalities.

The narrating ‘I’ of the three stories collected in Boží lano questions his faith in an attempt to dispel his doubts about his father who taught him to believe in God and in the family. Martin Vrána (KSA) thinks of his childhood in connection to the death of one of his former schoolmates. The news of his death comes at the moment of Martin’s own personal crisis. Death makes him realize how many things he has lost over the past few years and how he has never really understood the value of the things around him. Reminiscing about his childhood, he goes back to the time when he was twelve. He thinks of one of the numerous dialogues he had with his father at that time. They discussed Martin's wish to have his own room and a proper space for his own life, which his father kept denying him. Remembering this, Martin suddenly realizes that he did not manage to get his own room until he was forty and again living alone, separated from his wife and his children. Comparing both situations now, Martin sees the bitter paradox of his life and expresses deep sadness with his own self.

In Martin's thoughts, the family he grew up in is described as an extremely patriarchal unit:

'In his parents' flat he let his children go and play with a crowd of their cousins and went to greet his father. Again he saw his father's strange smile, which was full of anxiety and anger. This is how his father mastered these patriarchal situations; he used a little spur of wrath. Martin liked and respected this man. He respected him from the time he had stopped being afraid of him. And he had stopped being afraid of him after he had disobeyed him.'

['V bytě u svých rodičů pustil děti do bratrancekého a sestřenického houfu a pozdravil se s otcem. Zase ten jeho zvláštní úzkostně zlostný úsměv, jeho způsob zvládání těchto patriarchálních situací, drobný osten hněvu. Martin měl toho muže rád a vážil si ho, vážil si ho více od té doby, kdy se ho přestal bát. A přestal se bát, když ho neposlech.'] (KSA: 143)

Martin's father is described as a man with a strong personality who wields control over the whole family. He is the head of the family table. He is well respected by all his children and his wife. Martin depends on him but he tries to avoid him. Father loves Martin but shows disappointment when things do not go according to his wishes. Still, it is father who keeps calm and takes care of Martin's health after Martin is hurt in a traffic accident. Father's love for Martin is never expressed but it is always there, hidden behind his authoritative behaviour. Martin's love for his father is never expressed but also his love is always there, hidden behind his fearful but respectful eyes.

In Martin's family, father is recognized as an authority, 'mum' (always 'mum', not 'mother') is seen as a pure angel who gives her love to others through her hands – by preparing meals, by tidying rooms and by ironing clothes. While father speaks, 'mum' does all the work and hence is loved by Martin. She is the love which is visible and felt in everything she touches and in each of her looks.

Seeing Martin's parents in their individual roles, we see a family which fulfils the model of a traditional Christian upbringing. However, while the parents try to keep this tradition going, their children do not follow it when raising their own children. Martin struggles somewhere in between the old traditional values, which he admires as well as despises, and the contemporary practices of today that seems to be out of his control.

Martin looks for a key to his present life in his relationships with his parents. The same applies to both of his partners in love. In order to understand what led to her conscious decision to become a single mother, Eva Topolská refreshes her memory of family life. She thinks of her mother who was always away at work, of her father who left the children when they were small and did not come back until Eva was in her twenties. It was really Eva's grandparents who brought her up. She bestowed the warm feelings she would normally give her parents upon her grandparents, especially upon her grandfather who, as she remembered, was the only person who really looked after her and the only one who showed her love. Without the parents' authority, Eva grows up into a woman who has little trust in true love. She has never been able to live with a man for long; she was always escaping from one man to another, looking for something she could not recognize until she finally remained alone.

Where Eva lacks passion, Monika (Martin's latest partner) has had an overabundance of it. She grew up under her mother's overwhelming care but was always hidden from other people's view. She never knew anything about her father. She was always hidden away because she was her mother's 'sin'. Monika was able to bear this kind of life only until she became an adolescent when she ran away and, for several years, hid away in an underground community searching for her own independent identity and strength.

Martin, Eva and Monika came from different family backgrounds. While Martin was raised in a patriarchal environment, Monika grew up under matriarchal care. While Martin's parents represented traditional family values, Eva suffered from lack of support. Her parents were more interested in their professional career than in love. Martin and Monika knew what family love meant and so they find each other in love. Eva did not trust family relationships and so sought isolation and single motherhood.

In another of Balabán's stories, it is Patricia and Paul, the two protagonists of the story, 'Vděčná smrt' (JT), who search for an explanation of their current lives in their personal relationships with their parents. In order to understand what has happened to their current world, Patricia goes back to her past and recalls everything that had formed her American childhood. She talks of her mother who had German roots and was never able to adjust to the American environment; a mother who could not cope with her husband's departure for the Vietnam War and so used her son, Paul, to calm herself down by pinning her emotions to him. Patricia's mother could not cope with her husband's return and with her husband's post-war trauma and ended up committing suicide. Patricia thinks of her father who taught his son how to shoot animals; a father who went to the Vietnam War and then returned with a war trauma. She thinks of her father who left the family after her mother's death, who bought a truck and exchanged it for their real home. The memories that Patricia recalls in her mind are examined in relation to her and her brother's lives, their loneliness, their unsuccessful relationships, their excessive sensitivity, and their inability to love and live a 'normal' life.

The relationship between children and their parents is a complicated matter for almost all of Balabán's characters. It turns out to be also one of the main topics of Balabán's last work, Zeptej se táty. In this novel, it is Emil, Hans and Kateřina, two brothers and a sister, who seek an explanation of their life through their relationship with their father. Their observation of the present is interwoven with various thoughts and memories of their dying father and of what followed in the years after his death. Kateřina remembers the time when her father was standing at her bed praying for her life after she was hospitalized with serious health problems and nearly died. She remembers him as the only person for whom she decided to survive. So, whenever she felt vulnerable, she thought of her father – he was her support, he saved her. In the novel's present time, Kateřina is thirty-nine and she has an unsuccessful marriage behind her. And she is again ill. She is not suffering from a physical disease, but from depression and sadness due to her current life. This is the time when she turns her thoughts back to the past, to her father and the things they shared together. Paradoxically, she finds out that most of what they shared was blurred at the time of her illness. She considers the memories of her father to be the only untouchable security of her life.

Kateřina accesses the memory of her father through the heart. Hans does the same through his eyes. He is an artist and everything that happens in his life is connected to his visual and lyrically romantic perception of the world. However, like Kateřina, he has not found happiness in love. He cannot sleep and in the dark; he thinks of his father who also suffered from insomnia. Hans walks in the countryside and the light that comes through the trees reminds him of the same light he saw in his father's eyes shortly before he died. Hans feels lost in life without love. He calls out for father but is scared that there will be nothing, only his own darkness without love. His father is the light, the tree, the poplar and his God. Hans desires his father's (God-like) help but he never openly asks for it due to fear of his loss and out of respect.

Emil's view of his father is again different. Emil wants to become a writer and so he tends to write down his thoughts in a descriptive way. We follow him through his actions, his memories of his father lying on his death bed, his numerous visits to the hospital, the last words his father said before he died, his feelings about his dying father, his disgust directed towards his father's former friend, his father's stories, his contemplations of death, his visits to his father's grave, his memories of childhood and his dreams of his father brought before a judge to defend his life. Unlike Hans, Emil does not seek his father's help. Emil observes, he talks, he thinks and, in all his actions, he looks to understand his father's life and his influence on him:

‘Emil sees his childhood as a pre-history, a mythical time, when he still lived in unity with his gods, his mother and father and grandparents. Our human and pagan gods are always our grandparents. (...) Emil knows that he has become the sort of a man he is just now in the moment when this unity shattered. When he suddenly saw beyond his tribe, when he realized that he would be alone and die.’

[‘Skutečné dětství Emil vnímá jako prehistorii, mytický čas, kdy žil v jednotě se svými bohy, s matkou a s otcem a prarodiči. Naši lidští a pohanští bohové jsou vždycky našimi prarodiči. (...) Emil ví, že člověkem, jakým je teď, se stal ve chvíli, kdy se tato jednota otřásla. Kdy najednou viděl mimo svůj kmen, kdy pochopil, že bude sám a umře.’] (ZT: 148-149)

In contemplation of his father, Emil realizes how important and secure it is to live within his united family and how complicated, uncertain and painful it is to be separated from it and to live alone as an individual man. He feels that, without the support of his family, he would quickly lose his bearings, suffer from unbearable loneliness and die.

The parents represent home and safety for all the three above-mentioned Nedoma characters. The parents are their only certainty, the only thing that seemed to last whilst all the other certainties dissolve. The parents are the only stability which Kateřina, Emil and Hans have in their broken worlds. Nothing can destroy this stability, not even father's death. Their father is a doctor, a saviour of human lives (as Kateřina sees him), a man of faith, ‘God’, whom it is never possible to understand fully (as Hans sees him), a man full of doubt, grappling with unanswered questions (as Emil sees him) but constantly asking and seeking the truth. Once again, Nedoma's family is pictured as a patriarchal, Christian society. It is a picture of respect and deep love – and a symbol of human stability. Yet, Balabán's characters constantly question it. Significantly, the surname Nedoma means ‘not being at home’.

2.2.2 Parents and their children

Balabán's work analyzes the relationship between children and their parents from the perspective of both the children, as has been explored in the previous chapter, and the parents. It has been noted that the relationship between Kateřina, Emil and Hans (the last three Balabán's works) and their parents is complicated but still solid. Between the three siblings and their own children there is always a difficult and fragile link. This relationship does not seem to be subject to any rules – it is neither patriarchal nor matriarchal – and it struggles to survive. Kateřina lives with her bereaved mother and shares the care for her children with her mother-in-law and her ex-husband. Hans argues with his son about money and trust. Emil separates from his children after his marriage disintegrates. In other Balabán's stories, Pavel Nedostál ('Highlander': PR), Dr Satinský ('Seno': PR) and Martin Vrána (KSA) experience the same troubles with the upbringing of their own children.

In Balabán's texts, those men who divorce always live separately from their children but they never lose contact with them. Children become their only certainty in a world which has been shattered. They are an inspiration for the men's thoughts; they are their relief but also their source of confusion.

The time that the fathers spend with their children functions as their personal retreat. In the company of their children, the fathers look for peace with themselves and with others. So, Pavel Nedostál ('Silvestr Svinov': PR) escapes from the unpleasant atmosphere of his home to the company of his children. He takes them for a trip along a frozen river and to the places he knew in his past in order to forget about the troubled reality of his present life. Pavel's fellow friend, Dr Satinský ('Seno': PR), does the same. Roman Hradílek ('Salámoví koně': MO) also finds himself in the same situation as Pavel. He also escapes from a relationship which is already deteriorating to the company of his son and to the Czech countryside. The same applies to Hans ('Kluk': MO) and his fifteen year old son. Their journey back from their trip to the mountains raises many questions about passing time and the role Hans has played in the upbringing of his son, and he feels lonely and sad that he was not always there:

'A man cannot be mother. A man isn't allowed to go into the red and pink room. He can only lean over the railings and look from the outside. He can hide his hands behind his back, dig his nails into his palms, hold tears back. He looked into the boy's face. His eyes were impenetrable, he could no longer see into them the way he had been able to do in the past, when that small baby's head raised itself towards him from a pillow with trust. (...) He felt how uncertain his son still was, how he swung like a bean stalk. And yet he will have to push him away soon and stay alone in the wasteland that has appeared in the middle of his own heart.'

[‘Muž nemůže být matka. Muž nesmí do červeného a růžového pokoje. Může jen viset na zábradlí, nahlížet zvenčí. Schovat si ruce za záda, zarýt nehty do dlaní, zadržet slzy v očích. Díval se klukovi do tváře. Jeho oči byly neproniknutelné, už do nich neviděl jako dřív, jako tehdy, když se k němu ta malá dětská hlava s důvěrou pozvedala z polštáře. (...) Ucítit, jak je jeho syn ještě nepevný, jak se zakomíhal jako fazolový stonek. A přece ho bude muset už brzy od sebe odstrčit a zůstat sám na periferii, která vznikla uprostřed jeho vlastního srdce.’] (MO: 89)

Balabán’s men look for their personal redemption in the time shared with their children, but mostly end up facing a bare reflection of their own deeds. Women, on the other hand, see the hope of their life in their child totally and without a doubt. Pregnant Patricia (‘Vděčná smrt’: JT) leaves her past behind and moves to the small hut where she plans to start a new life with a baby on its way. Eva Topolská (KSA) is quite happy to raise her child without a man. Mrs Tomská deliberately decides to be the single mother of her daughter Monika (KSA) and Magda becomes the single mother of her son Jaromír (‘Magda’: MO). For Světlana (‘Světlana’: JT), her daughter is the only person who gives her strength to survive her husband’s death. Kateřina (‘Mléčná dráha’: JT) receives much support from their children after she suffers an attack of glycaemia. Dana (‘Prázdniny’: PR) fights her depression from a failed marriage only with the help of her children’s presence and love.

2.2.3 Brothers and sisters

This discussion about family relationships would not be complete without a few important remarks on communication between brothers and sisters. This communication is highlighted as one of the most significant for a number of Balabán’s characters and, for this reason, it cannot be left aside.

When the narrating ‘I’ of Boží lano (‘Americká elegie’) immerses himself in the memories of his youth and recollects all that may have been significant for his future life, he thinks of his brother Daniel. He remembers him as an artist who was always bespattered with paint and who was always drunk:

‘So awfully different, so awfully unpleasant, hanging onto our parents by means of quarrels without an end. He occupied all the rooms so ruthlessly and viciously. I could always only enter them as the second person. There was no place in the world where my brother had not been first. I had to look for such places outside of this world and then to seek the attention of the other people who were so preoccupied with the painful existence of my best friend.'

[‘Tak hrozně jiný, tak hrozně protivný, zavěšen na rodičích v hádkách, které nemají konce; bezohledně a neurvale zabydloval všechny pokoje, do kterých jsem já už mohl vstoupit jen jako druhý, a nebylo na světě místa, kde by můj bratr už přede mnou nebyl, musel jsem ta místa hledat mimo svět a pak se opožděně domáhat pozornosti lidí, tak zaměstnaných bolestnou existencí mého nejlepšího přítele.’] (BL: 14)

Brother Daniel is pictured as the narrator's best friend and the only ally the narrator has in his family. But he is also the narrator's greatest enemy and rival on his path towards personal recognition by people in his environment. The narrator looks up to him, for Daniel is a few years older and, in his view, also a very intelligent and talented man. But the narrator also despises him for all the attention his parents gave first to Daniel and only then to him. The narrator's attitude does not change even after his brother starts drinking and spends most of the time sitting in pubs. He never stops admiring him but, with the passing of time, his feelings of anxiety and envy vis-à-vis his brother subside and he finds peace within himself.

Emil Nedoma (MO, JT, ZT) experiences a very similar relationship with his brother Hans. His feelings towards Hans follow the same pattern. They oscillate between affection for an admirable and talented man and jealousy of his brother's success with women and in his career. Emil is split between gratitude for the relationship he has with his brother and his anger at his brother's perceived superiority and his own despicable thoughts about him:

'I liked you even more when we boozed together, when we went on pub crawls, when you still wasted your time with me. That was the time when we were closest to each other; in the ditch we swore at all and everyone and no one could understand us, the Nedoma boys. We were both in despair, no one took us seriously. Nowadays it is only me who is in despair and I can hardly cope with it since I do not have a mate upon whom I could lean in my grief. You could have failed just as easily as I have done. As it is, we are brothers only in name, not in predicament.'

[‘Ale ještě radši jsem tě měl, když jsme chlastali, když jsme chodili po hospodách, když jsi se se mnou ještě zahazoval a marnil. To jsme si byli nejbliž, v pangejtě jsme nadávali na všechny a na každého a nikdo nám, klukům Nedomovým, nerozuměl. Byli jsme zoufalí a zneuznaní oba. Teď jsem zoufalý jenom já a hůř se mi to nese, když nemám tovaryše svého, o kterého bych se v té lítosti mohl opřít. Stačilo málo a nic bys nedokázal jako já. Takhle jsme bratři jenom podle jména, ale ne osudem.’] (JT: 95)

In Emil's memories, Hans used to take up different roles. Hans was a child who used to falsely accuse Emil of not being his real brother; he was a drinking fellow at the time of Emil's personal frustration; he was an understanding companion at the time of Emil's personal breakdown and his ally against the enemies of his father; Hans represented someone Emil could have possibly become had he tried or had he been lucky, which he believes he was not. Next to Hans, Emil feels himself always to be a second rate partner, depressed and down, but he still loves his 'better brother'.

Hans's (MO, JT, ZT) feelings towards Emil are not expressed as openly as his brother's. When Hans talks of Emil, he does so only in connection with the places he happens to be in at the moment of his thoughts or in connection with his memories from his past. Hans remembers the things both brothers used to do together when they were children, but otherwise he reflects only on his own problems.

The third person to complete this Nedoma triangle is Kateřina (MO, JT, ZT). As Emil is more affectionate about family relationships than Hans, his bond with his sister is full of love. When Kateřina falls ill, he feels weak and sorry for himself. On the one hand, he is ashamed of being healthy; on the other hand, he is terrified that he might also succumb to such a serious condition as she has done. Lastly, he is embarrassed because, deep in his heart, he is glad not to be ill. He admires his sister's strength and blames himself for not being such a person himself. Kateřina seems to be closer to Emil than to Hans. She observes him, listens to his thoughts and understands him. Emil supports her when her marriage breaks down. Hans's behaviour does not show us any specific feelings for his sister. He is fully preoccupied by his own life.

Another relationship, the one between Emil's partner, Jeny, and her sister, Johana (ZT), is also tight with a strong bond. This is love redeemed from hatred and pain. Johana appears in the story at two different stages: first as a junkie who lives in Germany amongst the same sort of people and then later as a hospital patient on a recovery course. She swears at her sister and accuses her of collaborating with the corruption of capitalism. She looks up to her sister as though she was the Virgin Mary or could save her soul, and feels embarrassed about her own collapse. Jeny does not hate her sister. She is worried about her situation. She phones Johana, listens to her complaints, persuades her to have her baby and stands by her when she decides to undergo hospital treatment for her drug addiction. No matter how much Johana and Jeny differ, their relationship is solid. One sister cannot live without the other. Their mutual dependence is very strong, although each of them lives a different life in a different country. One represents the light and the other the darkness.

The relationship of two other sisters, or rather step-sisters, Monika and Ester Tomská (KSA), is quite different. Many years have to pass before both women are able to meet and talk. Ester, the older sister, cannot forget that her mother, Marie Tomská, decided to abandon her and concentrated her love on her younger sister, Monika. Monika does not know anything about Ester. But it is Monika who decides to write a letter to Ester and meet her. All this, however, happens only when they both grow old enough to be able to forgive and then they both do.

Similarly to what has been said about the erotic relationships and love, the family relationships of Balabán's characters are never smooth. They are full of various complications each individual has to overcome if he/she wants to find stability, and many of them never do. For example: as a child, Emil Nedoma (MO, JT, ZT) suffers from lack of confidence within his own family circle (brother Hans chases Emil away by telling him he does not belong to their family, sick sister Kateřina gets more attention from their parents than does anyone else). This feeling is later reflected in his own love life and in his parenthood. He finds it difficult to maintain a stable family life. He gets married, he becomes a father, he divorces, his ability to love dissolves, he drinks, he has suicidal thoughts and suffers from depression. He feels abandoned and so he encloses himself in his internal thoughts and in drunkenness and he contemplates his own death. Emil's relationship with his sister Kateřina shifts from envy and remorse to love and sympathy with her sickness. Emil's relationship with Hans is based on ambiguity. Emil admires Hans but he is also angry with his success.

Kateřina's childhood bond to her father is so strong that she is never able to find a man who would equal him. When she loses her husband, this only highlights the fact that she never found a relationship based on total unity of the two souls, a total devotion of one individual to the other. She can never find the ideal which her father instilled in her at the worst point of her illness. The loss of her father is painful but it is never destructive.

Hans is so wrapped up in the bubble of his own intelligence, creativity and success that, when his life starts to fall apart, he finds himself in a state of shock. The only way he can deal with the crisis is through his art – because art has become his life (ZT). (All that we learn about Hans's (ZT) life is through art, his art friends and his thoughts on art.) There is an analogical feature like this in all of Balabán's other characters.

2.3 Relationships with friends and random people

Balabán's characters do not spend time only in the closest circle of their family. No matter how much their minds are pre-occupied with relationships and with the members of their family, they still go out and meet people, although friendships or acquaintanceships do not seem to be at the centre of their attention, as it was in the texts by Emil Hakl. In many cases, we do not learn anything at all about the relationships of Balabán's characters with other people. Friends or acquaintances are often remembered in connection with a specific occasion (e. g. a character sees a drunk colleague in the street) and only serve to complete the image of the main character and his life (we learn of the main character's thoughts regarding the drunk colleague and regarding the situation which led to his drunkenness). Nevertheless, there are still some narratives that build their main plot from friendly discussions or random meetings of two former colleagues, love rivals or hospital patients.

A bond of friendship exists between Pavel Nedostál and Ivan Satinský ('Pilot': PR), but we only learn about the existence of this friendship when Ivan reminisces in the presence of his lover. Both Nedostál and Satinský are otherwise fully pre-occupied with their families and their erotic relationships, so the memory of their friendship is not as important. Elsewhere, we discover that there is a personal connection between Emil Nedoma and Petr Zábranský ('Tchoř': JT) when Emil borrows Petr's cottage in order to get drunk there, and when Petr comes to the same place to drink and to die ('Dona nobis pacem': JT). Nothing more and nothing less is said about their friendship, nor do the two men ever meet in the course of the narration. The narrating 'I' of the story, 'Žraločí srdce' (ST), and his friend Benda are brought together only for the purpose of a dream, a dream about love.

Pavel Nedostál, Ivan Satinský, Emil Nedoma and the narrating 'I' of the story 'Žraločí srdce' are pre-occupied with their search for love and with attempts to clarify their family relations. We follow both Nedostál and Satinský on their way to their personal breakdowns and then up to their spiritual recoveries, but we get hardly any information about the existence of other people that surround them. We know nothing about their friends, their acquaintances or colleagues at work. A completely different situation prevails, for example, in the case of Hans Nedoma (MO). His personal interest lies in the balance of all: love, family and friends. As he opens up to the reader, we follow not only his doubts about love (his relationship breakdown) and his thoughts on the family but also his encounters with some friends: photographer Bednář ('Kolotoč': MO), with whom he discusses his art and once again his relationship, or with artist Michal ('Teroristka': MO), with whom he talks about one of his paintings and his own self. Nedoma's father, Jan, also has some friends, although we do not learn this until after his death (ZT), when this information becomes vital to the further development of the story.

Only two of Balabán's stories are built on dialogues between two friends or acquaintances: the story 'Cedr a kladivo' (MO) offers personal testimonies of two men who are being treated in a rehabilitation centre for alcohol addicts. The story, 'Viadačka' (JT), follows the friendly discussion between two male colleagues about illness and possible treatments.

2.4 To sum up: Balabán's characters in relationships with other people

The above analysis of Balabán's work shows us a few important things: Balabán's fictive world is quite significantly built on human relationships. Love is an extremely important part of Balabán's characters' lives – without love, there is no happiness, no hope, no life. Love and the existence of family bonds give Balabán's characters certain stability and certain belief in human good and in a brighter world. However, in the reality of Balabán's characters, love and family bonds are also the main source of troubles and personal downfalls. In Balabán's work, a strong human relationship is an important foundation for a satisfying existence. If there is no one to share life with, it becomes a wasteland with no way out but death. Sharing or, in other words, love, is, in the view of Balabán's characters, the only way to happiness. Love brings faith in life and faith brings belief in the human self and in God – in the human self within God.

Balabán's fictive world is based on the constant search for happiness and on its constant rejection. Life full of happiness, in which Balabán's characters believe, calls for love and for unity of human beings. It is a Christian ideal of the world in which Balabán's characters wish to live – the world of human love and the world of human love to God. But it is the reality of the current world that brings doubts to the minds of all Balabán's characters and, with them, also their personal breakdowns.

Czech society, in Balabán's works, is described as a society of people who struggle in their search for a peaceful life in unity with others. It is a society of broken people, broken communities and broken worlds – awaiting the light of love.

Balabán's characters perceive their relationships with others through their love; how they perceive their selves within the outside world is the subject of the following chapter.

3. The individual experience

3.1 Life as a reflection of the self. Words and thoughts v actions.

Balabán's characters built their lives on interaction with other people. When they think of their relationships, they think of already existing relationships or relationships that have already ended. When they actually talk of relationships, they do it only briefly and often in fragments. More than discussed, relationships in Balabán's works are contemplated inside the characters' heads and only sometimes do they turn into words. Dying relationship is never subject to discussion. We learn about it from separate internal testimonies of both partners. Existing relationship is lived as well as thoroughly analyzed, also more in the minds of the characters rather than openly discussed.

So it happens that most of the important matters dealing with love and family issues are communicated to the reader in the form of the internal monologue. As we gain access to the minds of the characters, we discover things that have happened before the relationship broke down, the family split up or before people experienced their personal crisis, before their presumed happiness ended. For example, we are never directly present during the conflict between Emil Nedoma and his ex-wife ('Tchoř': JT), during the conflict between Pavel Nedostál and Dana ('V neděli', 'Silvestr Svinov', 'Prázdniny': PR) or Roman Hradílek and Uršula ('Uršula': MO). We never directly witness the friendship between Jan Nedoma and Petr Wolf (ZT) or Pavel Nedostál and Ivan Satinský ('Pilot': PR). We are never directly introduced to the upbringing of Emil Nedoma, Hans Nedoma and Kateřina Nedomová. We find out about some of these matters in retrospective and we track them in the characters' minds. There are only few dialogues that unfold between Balabán's characters. These are the dialogues between Emil Nedoma and his young partner, Jeny, between all the members of the Nedoma family (especially in ZT) and between Martin Vrána and his lovers, Eva Topolská and Monika Tomská (KSA). But, even if we follow these dialogues, we do not learn much more than what we have already discovered from the individuals' inner thoughts.

There are only a few actions presented in Balabán's fiction. But even these actions are always wrapped in spoken and unspoken words and thoughts. Actions set the scene. Thoughts fill up this scene with actions. Most information we get about Balabán's characters is mediated through the inner thoughts of the individual narrators. The internal world, enriched by only a few occasional dialogues, is the place where most of the important things happen:

“They talked for a long time. Four chimneys of the old power station rose on the other side of the river, and behind them, grey blue clouds moved along the golden looking afternoon sky.
 “Touch what?”
 “Our life.”
 “Have we had any?”
 “Exactly, the life we’ve never had; the life which has never taken place.”
 “At least we couldn’t spoil it,” Martin said harshly, all of sudden.
 “You have already spoiled a life, haven’t you?”
 “More lives. Some of them I have spoiled, some of them I did not even allow. And I feel as though nothing has really taken place yet.”
 “I don’t believe you. I think this might apply to me, but not to you.”
 [‘Dlouho si povídali a za řekou vystupovaly čtyři komíny staré elektrárny a za nimi na zlatavém odpoledním nebi táhly modrošedé mraky.
 „Viš, bojím se toho třeba jen dotknout.“
 „Čeho vlastně?“
 „Toho našeho života.“
 „My jsme nějaký měli?“
 „Právě toho, který jsme neměli, toho, který se nestal.“
 „Aspoň se nemohl pokazit,“ řekl Martin najednou tvrdě.
 „Ty už jsi nějaký život pokazil, že?“
 „To ti zas nevěřím já, sobě bych to věřila, ale tobě ne.“] (KSA: 115)

In this example, it is Martin Vrána and Eva Topolská (KSA) who, in their talk, express their disappointment and grief for the loss of their love. Actually, it is almost the only presented dialogue in which both characters engage on this matter; almost the only dialogue we can follow directly and without just imagining it. Everything that has happened before or after this dialogue is a matter of individual internal testimony. But even this particular dialogue does not provide any direct answers to many questions which will arise in our mind throughout Martin’s and Eva’s story. Whatever the partners say seems to be dreamy and very distant from anything real and anything true. The second example is focused on thoughts only:

‘František Josef has been feeling in danger for several months now. Patricie and he have been trying to save themselves by conducting long discussions at the kitchen window. They talked and talked as if they wanted to rewrite their lives into more sensible shapes. As if it was possible. They have wine and coffee and plenty of cigarettes and long nights. That’s probably all they have. František Josef has also a bottle of vodka about which Patricie doesn’t know. And he fears that Patricie is not well, her eyes, her round eyes, what has happened to her eyes? As if they belonged to a totally different, horrible woman. As if it was a different, horrible man staring at him. The darkness outside in the courtyard is fading. Time is running through the narrow bottleneck of an hour-glass.'

[‘František Josef cítil ohrožení už několik měsíců. Zachraňovali se s Patricií dlouhými hovory u kuchyňského okna. Mluvili a mluvili, jako by chtěli přepsat své životy do smysluplnějšího tvaru. Jako by to bylo možné. Mají víno a kávu a kupu cigaret a celé noci. A to je tak všechno, co mají. František má ještě vodku, o které Patricie neví. A obavy, že Patricie není v pořádku, její oči, její kulaté oči, o to má s očima? Jako by se na něj dívala úplně jiná, hrozná žena. Jako by se na ni díval úplně jiný, hrozný chlap. Tma na dvoře za okny bledne. Čas protéká úzkým hrdlem.’] (CB: 32)

This second example is only an excerpt of what we know about both characters: we know about the existence of a love relationship between František Josef and Patricie (CB). We also learn that this relationship is not without a problem. We do not know who or what has created the problem. We do not know what František and Patricie did to solve the problem, what actions they took or how they discussed it. What we know is that both characters sit and talk about it, that they both talk about their relationship and their personal troubles. What we are given is their observations and their thoughts about each other and about the situation in which they happen to be. The rest is unknown.

Similar things are happening throughout the whole of Balabán's fiction. Balabán's characters do not give us their stories in full and in detail. Many things are only suggested or mentioned without any further explanation or background. Facts are hidden behind a mass of internal thoughts. They are kept in the secrecy of the human mind.

Balabán's stories are not based on physical actions but on mental turmoil. The texts are built on the self-reflection of various individuals, on the personal testimonies of women and men who look at the world through their minds rather than express it by means of spoken words. Their internal world is an important processor of the surrounding reality. The outer world is overwhelming but what effect it has on each individual we learn only from their fragmented memories, fragmented actions and from their conscious decision to respond to it. Everything merely reflects their thoughts and internal feelings.

3.2 The difference between Balabán's male and female characters

We have noted that all the characters' thoughts and internal feelings are delivered to the reader by means of an internal monologue. What the internal monologue does here is that it gives the reader the illusion that he/she has an unmediated access to the characters' minds and so he/she has the key to understanding their actions. The internal monologue brings the reader within the proximity of the character and, by this, also influences his/her own feelings about that particular character and his/her actions. The more the reader knows about the intentions of that particular character, the more he/she is willing to understand this character's behaviour and the more he/she is able to accept it (Stanzel 1988: 161).

In his literary works, Balabán uses one narrating character or more than one narrating character. In the case of more narrating characters, the understanding of the characters' actions is divided into several perspectives and so it is also more complicated and less clear. In the majority of Balabán's fiction, it applies that it is a male and a female perspective that meets in a narrative of a single story. Therefore, also the reader's understanding of the narrative is divided into a male and a female version of things. In this chapter, we will look at the significance of such practices and in the characteristics of Balabán's men and women.

3.2.1 Balabán's men and their escapes

Balabán's work tells various stories of various men who, in most cases though, belong to the same or nearly the same generation. At the time of the text's fictive present (see below), they are between 35 and 45 years of age. Most of them have grown-up children. Most of them have attempted to lead a normal family life and failed. Most of them are divorced, live alone or are in a new relationship with a much younger person. Most of these men find it hard to cope with their loneliness, after their relationship or marriage has broken down, and so they drink and get very drunk. Most of these men lack self-confidence and struggle in search to gain it. Once again, most of these men drink. Jonáš ('Denatur': ST) drinks because he is unhappy with his life and only in the state of complete drunkenness is he able to reflect upon it and survive. Then he lets his thoughts roam and he says, in sadness and irony:

'We are not here. We are somewhere else. For example we sit in a room whose only furniture is a cabinet filled with bottles containing colourless liquid. And we drink and drink. We drink automatically, mechanically, like a human being breathes while sleeping. We always reach out for the bottle when there is a danger that we might become sober. Fear of death has been replaced by fear of sobriety. But how can we even think about this since we are totally wasted?'

vystřízlivění. Ale copak o tom můžeme uvažovat, když jsme zpítí pod obraz boží!']
(ST: 59)

Roman Hradílek ('Uršula': MO) escapes to a pub because he does not have the strength to face his wife's complaints and his presumed responsibility for being the main reason for them. Ivan Satinský ('Proměny': PR) and František Josef (CB) drink in order to forget their shattered lives after divorce and family disruption. For Martin Vrána (KSA), alcohol is the only way of coping with an abrupt awakening from his romantic dream (love, youth and light-hearted reality) into an unfriendly present (his sudden separation from the love of his life, his routine work in a local factory and later also an unhappy marriage). Ivan Figura (KSA) is haunted by his own remorse for everything that happened to him after he had lost his job, his wife, his friends and his confidence in whatever he does or did, and so he drinks too. For Emil Nedoma ('Emil': MO, 'Tchoř': JT), alcohol is the only presumed salvation available in this world, the only thing that presumably helps him cope and survive. At home, he keeps a ten-litre bottle of vodka to be sure he always has enough to drink (MO). When thinking of his brother Hans, he does it through an alcoholic haze (his brother bought him the above mentioned bottle; it was with his brother that he used to drink in protest against conventional society.) Inebriation helps Emil to reflect upon his family and his position amongst its members freely and without feeling ashamed:

'Dad, I kept thinking of all that when, later, during bad Christmas Eves and other evenings, now without you, without my wife, without my child, without Mark, Mark and without little Child Jesus, I ordered a shot of rum in a half-empty non-stop bar. That's where it had brought me. There I was. Television broadcast the most beautiful fairytales, those Communist fairytales with Werich in the main role of the king, which he once was. And we, the unhappy morons, were moved by the smell of rum, which used to be kept in the pantry, it was only to be used for Christmas cookies. I won't have time to tell you where it has brought me, what I have achieved by this. What I did with it. I know you weren't over the moon because of me.'

['Táto, na to všechno jsem vzpomínal, když jsem si potom o zlých štědrých dnech a večerech už bez vás a bez ženy a bez dítěte, bez Marka, Marka a bez Jezulátka poroučel v poloprázdném nonstopu rum. Tam mě to přivedlo. Tam jsem byl, a v televizi dávali nejkrásnější pohádky, ty komunistické pohádky s Werichem králem, který jednou byl. A my, pitomci nešťastní, jsme se dojíмали vůní rumu, který druhdy stával jen v komoře, jen do cukroví. To už ti nestihnu říct, kam mě to přivedlo, co jsem tím dokázal. Co jsem s tím udělal. Víím, že tobě radost ne. ']
(JT: 98)

Drunk, Emil remembers his sister Kateřina, his brother Hans, his son Marek, his parents and all his personal mishaps in his relationship with them. Drunk, he also contemplates his death. With the help of alcohol, Emil tries to beat his own sadness from his lost youth (in the above example it is 'rum', and so alcohol again, that functions as a symbol of his lost youth), lost love and lost ideals, and omnipresent feelings of his own inappropriateness in the family and the world. Alcohol is his light and, at the time of his personal crisis, also his only sad lover (he physically embraces the bottle). From Emil's memories we also learn that his brother Hans had serious problems with alcohol when he was young and when he separated from his wife ('Tchoř': JT).

Similarly, we could endlessly multiply examples of how Balabán's characters approach the difficulties of the world. Escape into inebriation is one of them. The other is escape into dreams and fantasy world (Karel escapes from his wife's wishes into a heroic dream in 'Odpoledne a večer': PR); to the countryside (Pavel Nedostál escapes from his wife's quiet anger to the winter surroundings of the river Odra in 'Silvestr Svinov': PR; Ivan Satinský cycles with his son across the summer countryside in 'Seno': PR; Emil Nedoma hides from his own life and from others in the countryside hut in 'Tchoř': JT); into art (an artist, Bednář, hides his personal unhappiness behind his photographic work in 'Kolotoč': MO); into a different environment (František Josef, Bogomil: CB travel to Canada – Bogomil in order to escape from his femme fatal Johana, František Josef in order to find a peace in his unsettled mind); into memories (Emil escapes from his personal sadness into his memories of his family in 'Tchoř': JT and Pavel Nedostál into memories of his childhood in 'V neděli', 'Highlander': PR); into ancient history (Jaromír escapes from his lacking self-confidence and lacking acceptance of the present world into human prehistory in 'Triceratops': MO); into life on the road (Patricia's and Paul's father escapes from the memories of the Vietnam war into the life on the road in 'Vděčná smrt': JT); to God (Štěpán Jařab escapes from his personal indifference into the testimonies of Jehovah witnesses in 'Armagedon': PR) and into thoughts of death (Emil Nedoma contemplates his suicide in 'Tchoř': JT).

As it is also apparent from the above listed summary of some characters' reactions, Balabán's male characters are not any real heroes. Whenever a problem arises, they lose their head and collapse. As adults, they suffer from the loss of their naïve dreams and from the loss of confidence in the possibilities of a happy life. They search for a way to escape from the world in which they live. They find refuge in alcohol or in their memories of the past. They wait, hidden within their human shell, until it is safe to come out and search for another way of life. After his divorce, Emil Nedoma (see the last three works by Balabán) spends many years in total drunkenness and in search for his own self. He occupies himself with his memories, with his internal thoughts and he questions his belief in God. František

Josef (CB) tries to find a way out of his personal confusion with the help of alcohol and a temporary stay in a foreign country. Bogomil (Ibid.) runs away and, for many years, wanders through the world before he regains his safe stability on a different continent in the company of completely different people.

Nearly all of Balabán's key male characters follow the same path – they remember a relatively idyllic or naïve childhood, a romantic youth before they fell in love and got married. They remember failure and a personal breakdown that followed their initial happiness. They talk of their wanderings after they experienced the collapse of their personal life. And some of them express their feelings after they were rewarded with a new love and strengthened family bonds. Some of them contemplate death as they believe that only death can free them of any restraints. All of them fight with loneliness.

Balabán's male characters are people with ordinary features and no special achievements. Their stories are as unique as the world of each individual can be, yet there are many aspects that connect them. From the conventional point of view, they are not heroic. They are philosophers of their own life as well as dreamers. They are losers, cowards and naïve believers in good until there is a crisis and they stand face-to-face with the suddenly discovered cruelty of the world. Only a few of them accept responsibility for their own lives and then they hold on to it (father Nedoma: ZT, Martin Vrána's father in KSA). Most of them find it extremely difficult to cope. They struggle and, in this struggle, they finally become their own heroes fighting against their own personalities, their faults and their failures. Balabán's female characters display different qualities.

3.2.2 Women, their responsibilities and their grief

Like Balabán's key male characters, Balabán's key female characters also have their own voice and they use it to express their own feelings and thoughts. They are the narrators of their own lives as much as their men are the narrators of their own reality. Balabán's female characters come from different generations. Dana ('Prázdny': PR), Uršula ('Uršula': MO), Johana (CB), Eva Topolská (KSA) and Kateřina Nedomová (last three Balabán's works) are of the same generation as their male counterparts (Dana – Pavel Nedostál, Uršula – Roman Hradílek, Johana – Bogomil, Eva Topolská – Martin Vrána). They are their first partners or wives. Jeny ('Moving into the universe...', 'Lední medvěd Telecomu': PR), Jeny (ZT), Patricie (CB), Monika Tomská (KSA), possibly Taťána ('Proměny', 'Pilot': PR) and Jennifer (CB) are several years younger than their men. They are the men's new partners (Jeny – Pavel Nedostál, Jeny – Emil, Patricie – František Josef, Monika Tomská – Martin Vrána, Tařána – Ivan Satinský and Jennifer – Bogomil). The difference in generation also brings a difference in the way these women approach the world in which they live.

When we are introduced to Dana's and Urřula's testimonies, we meet them on the verge of their middle-age personal breakdown. Dana is separated from her husband. She is living alone with her children, unable to work and to care for anyone the way she did before. She suffers from loneliness and depression and, in order to forget about it, she drinks a lot and sleeps a lot. She buries herself in the memories of her past and in tears. Urřula is facing the same predicament. We meet her at the time when the deteriorating relationship with her husband becomes an ongoing problem. Urřula suspects that her husband cheats on her and, in order to escape from such thoughts, she spends hours in the bathroom crying her eyes out. Johana does not have her own narrating voice. All we learn about her is from her husband, Bogomil, and her nephew, Frantiřek Josef. Johana is presented as Bogomil's 'femme fatale', always different and always strong in her life and in her views – as a person who has never really accepted reality. Eva Topolská is the only woman whose life we can follow in a continuous manner. We see her as a young, determined and pragmatic person who sacrifices romantic love for personal freedom and a more stable and practical existence (when she splits up with Martin Vrána). We see her as a woman who can be hard and strong in her attitudes and feelings when she wants to hide her weaknesses and fears (in her relationship with Ivan Figura and afterwards). We learn about her painful relationship with her parents, with all the men she met and with the father of her child; we learn about her fear of intimacy and of her strength in her struggle against adversity in life at the expense of love. Kateřina Nedomová has an exceptional position among these women. She is solitary and her life is mainly a fight against illness and all that relates to it. She fights for her health and regains her father. She fights for her marriage and regains her children. She fights for her dying father and regains her brothers' love.

Frantiřek Josef's Patricie, Bogomil's Jennifer, Martin's Monika, Emil's Jeny and some other women have a totally different position in Balabán's texts and in the lives of his male protagonists. All of them are new partners to their male counterparts. The main issue they try to solve in their present lives is the uncertainty of their current relationships they experience with their new partners who are much older than them, not the loneliness and the loss. They are 'in' a relationship whilst the previously mentioned women are 'out' of a relationship. They struggle with their current situation and with their youth while the other women, women in their mid-years, struggle to cope with their ageing and with things that happened in the past.

From all that we have learnt about Balabán's key male characters, it follows that the most significant thing they all have in common is the weakness in their behaviour towards the outside world. Whenever something important or unexpected happens, whenever they are supposed to act, change something, decide something or fight for/against something, they crumble and run away. They drink because, with the help of alcohol, it is easier to face reality or to forget. They go to the pub and meet friends because with them they do not have to think about their family responsibilities and duties they should be attending to but do not. They pretend sleep, because in sleep, nothing is real, not even their failure in sexual activity, should it happen. They move to a different country, they occupy themselves with work; they do everything possible in order to escape from the responsibility of conquering their own fears. They lose control over their own selves and over the lives of others and, as such, they also suffer.

The burden of responsibility for the family and for the outside world is in Balabán's work carried on women's shoulders. Women are caring mothers (Dana in 'Prázdniny': PR, Patricia in 'Vděčná smrt': JT), patient partners or wives (Patricie: CB, Monika: KSA, Jeny: ZT), doctors for the men's souls (Taťána in 'Proměny': PR) and bodies (Betyna in 'A ptáci taky': MO). At the same time, they fight to preserve their own health (Patricie: CB, Kateřina: 'Mléčná dráha': JT, Johana: CB), they fight for their families (Světlna in 'Světlna': JT, Mrs Tomská: KSA), to save the human species (Johana's fictive hero Ema: CB) and for the protection of their personal dignity (Johana: CB). Women are the ones who are left to fight in defence of their own lives and the lives of their children whilst the majority of men just wander away until happiness finds them again.

Each of Balabán's characters has personal issues. But, whilst men are simply afraid of any kind of responsibility and try to avoid behaving like adults, women are different. There is no place for fear in women's lives. They have a very strong sense of self-preservation. They have personal strength that guides them through all the difficulties they encounter.

3.2.3 The acceptance of ageing and its denial

As is apparent from the above analysis of Balabán's characters, Balabán's key male characters and his key female protagonists apply a different attitude to the reality of their lives and to the passing of time. Balabán's men are stuck in timelessness. They grow old but they are hardly concerned about their age or, at least, they only rarely express their fears about it. Their minds are still the minds of boys, avoiding any concept of adult responsibility and duty. These men are much more irrational than pragmatic and they are far more romantic than practical. Balabán's women are the opposite. As they grow old, they are more and more conscious of their own age. They cry because they are helpless against their ageing. They look in the mirror and see empty bodies deserted by their husbands and children. They feel that their bodies are only shells without a life, yet they still embrace it as the last reminders of their past happy times.

'Dana felt that something inside her broke. As if a part of her body got loose. A kidney, the uterus, a lung. Ah. She turned onto her side. She closed her eyes in front of the scratched wall. The children scratched it, when they were still small. With fingernails. She kept her eyes closed, tears escaping through her nose. She turned back, burying her face in the pillow. They don't come to my bed anymore as they used to. Her belly was underneath, her breasts were squashed and she felt constricted. What is the time? I don't care. It's not dawn yet.'

[‘Dana cítila, že se v ní cosi utrhlo. Jako by se uvolnil nějaký orgán. Ledvina, děloha, plicní lalok. Och. Převalila se na bok. Zavřela oči před podrápanou zdí. Podrápaly ji děti, když byly malé. Nehtama. Držela oči zavřené a slzy jí tekly nosem. Převrátila se zpátky tváří do polštáře. Už za ní nelezou do postele jako kdysi. Pod sebou břicho, rozplácá prsa a těsno. Kolik je hodin? Ale kašlu na to. Beztak se teprv rozednívá.’] (PR: 60)

In this example, it is Dana ('Prázdniny': PR) who embraces her own exhausted body in bed in memory of her past family life. In the example below, it is Magda ('Magda': MO) who takes shelter within her body while thinking of her recent decision to leave the father of her child and stay alone with her son:

'Magda sits down on the plastic chair which has been left behind by the previous tenant. She lights up a cigarette and huddles within her own intimacy limited by her shoulders and knees, her collarbones, her small bosoms, her womb and her arms. This is my home. Here, I will make a bed for you, my little son. She smokes and cries a little.'

[‘Magda si sedne na plastickou židli, kterou tu nechal předchozí nájemník. Zapálí si cigaretu a celá se schoulí do intimního prostoru ohraničeného rameny a koleny, klíčními kostmi, malými prsy, klínem a pažemi. Tady jsem doma. Tady ti ustelu postýlku, chlapečku. Kouří a trochu brečí.’] (MO: 22-23)

Both women hide within their bodies as they feel that their bodies are the only thing which remains after everything else is gone. Their body is a representation of their womanhood as well as a symbol of their motherhood and its loss.

In Balabán's works, a female body is a symbol of fertility, of a new life and a family. Nearly all Balabán's key female characters take a stance on the issue of family life and motherhood. If they have children, they often rely on them as on the only surviving reminder of their past, of their once happier times as they perceive it. If they do not have children, they regret not having had them although some of them do not show it. Children do not betray their mothers; they stay even after the family disintegrates and save their mothers from a total breakdown (this happens in the cases of Dana in 'Prázdniny': PR, Uršula in 'Uršula': MO, Mrs Tomská: KSA, Mrs Nedomová: ZT, Eva: KSA, Kateřina in 'Mléčná dráha': JT and Magda in 'Magda': MO). If there are no children, life becomes strange, wasted and sad (as in the cases of the photographer Bednář's wife in 'Kolotoč': MO, Marie's in 'Výročí svatby': ST and Johana's: CB).

In Balabán's works, the women who are of the same age as their men and reach their mid-years represent life in the disrupted family. Younger women represent an attempt of their older partners to build a new life. In Balabán's works, it is not uncommon that men, when they reach their mid-years, suffer from their personal crises, leave their original partners and, after some time spent in loneliness, they seek happiness elsewhere. As they grow older, they fall for younger women and, to their surprise, younger women accept their courtship.

In contrast to Balabán's key male characters, all of Balabán's key female characters seek maturity and experience in matters of love and relationships. Married women are disappointed when their partners do not show enough commitment to family life and to them and so they complain. The younger women see experience in their older partners and for this they admire them. Nevertheless, even these younger women often struggle with their male partners and their habits which have survived from their first relationship and the chaotic years after its breakdown. Monika Tomská (KSA), František Josef's Patricie (CB), Emil's Jeny (ZT), Bogomil's Jennifer (CB) or Jaromír's Lenka ('Triceratops': MO), all go through the same experience. Jennifer knows that Bogomil's heart has been torn out by his mad ex-wife, Johana, but still she loves him, in spite of all his loneliness and the oddity with which he presents himself in his new world. Jeny loves Emil Nedoma, being aware of all his weaknesses, past alcoholic excesses and the inappropriate behaviour which he sometimes displays when dealing with others. The same applies to Monika and Patricie. Lenka is attracted to Jaromír because she finds him an inspiring teacher and mentor for her own thoughts.

For Balabán's key characters, age is a factor with an ambiguous value that matters to some but does not matter to others. Age is a key issue for the ageing women whenever they think of their physicality – their receding fertility and sex appeal (see the predicament of Dana in ‘Prázdniny’: PR, Uršula in ‘Uršula’: MO, female toilet attendant in ‘Niagarské vodopády’: ST and Pavla in ‘Odpoledne a večer’: PR). In the following example, it is Pavla who is contemplating her sexuality face-to-face with her ageing body and her ageing man:

‘Does she want to make love to her man? After so many stagnant years she wants a guy? She made an angry grimace. But still! It’s like a cramp, this urge. To have him inside. To be full of him. She can understand now why a woman can kill her husband with a kitchen knife. She used to say that no one should be sacrificed to sex. But not any more. The police would call it a slaughter. Things like this happen everywhere. Pah! I don’t want to be an old and closed woman yet. Don’t you see this?’

[‘Chce se milovat s mužem? Po tolika letech nehybnosti chce chlapa? Vztekla ohnula ret. Ale přece! Je to jako křeč. Mít ho v sobě. Být ho plná. Už chápe, že ženská může zabít manžela kuchyňským nožem. Vždycky říkala, že za to nikdo nestojí, ale teď! Policajti tomu říkají domácí zabíjačka, je toho všude plno. Fúj! Já nechci ještě být stará a zavřená. Copak to nevíš?'] (PR: 34)

Uršula gives up on her sexuality the moment she stops arguing with her husband about his presumed infidelity.

Age is an important point also for younger women, especially if they find themselves in a relationship with a man who belongs to an older generation (Jeny – Emil, Patricie – František Josef, Monika – Martin Vrána) exactly because they worry about the age difference that lies between them. Once again, age is not such an important issue for men, because men’s minds do not seem to grow old, they remain juvenile till death.

Another difference between Balabán’s male and female characters lies in the way in which they approach the reality of their own selves and in the way in which they balance their selves with the reality of the outer world.

3.2.4 Men are out for themselves, women work for others

Balabán’s key male characters ‘live’ their lives: they love, give, take, share, fail, lose and survive. They seek things, they miss things; they suffer and lose, they gain. They do not fight for themselves and for others; they passively observe, give up, get lost and wait until new ‘happiness’, always in the form of love, finds them. Their heroic side manifests itself in their internal struggle with their personal weaknesses, in their thoughts, in their dreams and their imagination. In reality, they struggle with their inability to comply with the responsibility of adulthood and with their habits. In dreams, on the other hand, they are able to fight dragons (Karel in his dream in ‘Odpoledne a večer’: PR), sharks (the narrating ‘I’ fights sharks to save the life of a loving girl and his and his friend’s life in his dream in ‘Žraločí srdce’: ST) or other fantastic creatures (the narrator of the story ‘Men’: ST battles with creatures on his way to the light and to the personal salvation). In the imagination of their authors, they fight to save the whole planet (in Johana’s fictive story, it is Ivo who takes part in the mission which aims to save the future of his planet: CB) or the civilization as a whole from hunger (in František Josef’s fictive story, it is Animuk who is sent to leave his tribe in order to take away the hunger and to save its people from threatening death: CB).

The position of Balabán’s women is different. Women ‘live’ their lives in ‘fighting’. They fight with the real because they have to fight – for themselves and their family. Adult women do not have any illusions about their lives; they are clear about what they see and they call it by its true name. So Patricia (‘Vděčná smrt’: JT) unveils the truth about the unfortunate relationship between her mother and her brother Paul, whilst he does not want to hear about it. Uršula (‘Uršula: MO’) openly talks about the infidelity of her husband while he never mentions it. No matter how much Jeny loves her partner, Emil (ZT), it does not stop her from drawing a raw picture of his behaviour. Kateřina (ZT) is not afraid to voice her concerns about her own body in relation to her advancing womanhood, in relation to her motherhood and in relation to her present:

‘I am thirty nine and I still remember the holidays I have not had for the last twenty years. I have two children and I still feel like a childless person after an abortion. As if the only thing that has come out of my whole life was the sensation of a brutal ending, everything was stopped abdominally, my blood, my milk, my heart, my motherhood was ejected. After you have done it you don’t even know why you are still alive, disconnected from all that good that is now running away. (...) Who are you, Kateřina?’

[‘Je mi třicet devět a pořád si pamatuji na prázdniny, které jsem už dvacet let neměla. Mám dvě děti a pořád si připadám jako bezdětná po potratu. Jako by mi z celého života měl zbýt jen ten pocit brutálního ukončení, jen to hnusné zabrzdění krve, mléka, srdce, jen to vyvrácené mateřství. Když to uděláš, ani nevíš, proč jsi ještě na světě, odpojena od všeho toho rozbíhajícího se dobra. (...) Co jsi, Kateřino?’] (ZT: 47)

Like Kateřina, Balabán’s women are not scared of expressing their views on the things around them. They actively face the reality that surrounds them, no matter how hard it is and how much pain it means for them and for others. Balabán’s men are different. In order to face the pain, they need their women and their help and support.

3.3 Body (time) and soul (eternity)

In the above chapters, we have indicated the way Balabán's characters (and the reality they construct) are shaped by the influence of their relationships with other individuals. We have discovered connections that work on the levels of partnership and love, family and friends and gender distinctions. We have analyzed what impact these connections have on the individual's perception of the real and on the real they construct. Now it is time to have a look at how Balabán's characters react to the material of the world and to the spirit of the self, to God and to the universe. The argument we will follow is that Balabán's works are built as human reflections on body and soul, reflections on time and eternity.

3.3.1 Illnesses and mental disorders

The previous discussion of people's individuality within gender distinctions touched upon the problems which Balabán's characters have with the passing of time. This related to the ageing of individuals and the way the notion of time functions in relationships between men and women, between them and their parents or between them and their growing children. But time works on various levels in Balabán's narratives: it determines the individual's age, it marks the individual's existence and the existence (and motions) of the whole world.

Balabán's key male and female characters are presented as plausible individuals. They are not shapes, schemes or ideas with an immortal soul. Like real people, they have 'real' bodies and, as such, they also experience physical and mental pain, and this makes them think about basic human values and their meaning within the passing of time. Through such thoughts, they search for their place within the world they inhabit.

In Balabán's work, pain or illness is nothing exceptional. It comes to Balabán's characters randomly and quite often, and affects young as well as already retired. A toilet attendant from 'Niagarské vodopády' (ST) has a problem with obesity. Marie ('Výročí svatby': ST) is repulsed by every form of sex and she hates everything that relates to it. Daniel Nedostál fights with the sleeplessness of old people ('Nespavost': PR). Dr Satinský's aunt, Natálie, also suffers from insomnia after her lover dies ('Natálie': PR). Patricie (CB) is diabetic; Johana (CB) is insane. On one of his walks, Martin Vrána (KSA) becomes the victim of a car accident and he remains unconscious for many days. Dr Kraus and Pavel Červenka ('Cedr a kladivo': MO) both spend time in a psychiatric hospital in alcohol addiction wards. As a child, Kateřina Nedomová ('Hořící dítě: MO) nearly dies from a combination of kidney failure and acute diabetes. Oldřich ('A ptáci taky': MO) tries to battle ornithophobia, and the old doctor, Karel Chudoba ('Ray Bradbury': MO), a rapidly approaching Alzheimer's disease. Patricia's father ('Vděčná smrt': JT) experiences post-war trauma after he comes back from the Vietnam War. Ludvík Chmelnický looks for the help of a natural healer after his asthma gets worse ('Viadačka': JT). Saša's lungs fail after many years of heavy smoking ('Oblak': JT). Father Jan Nedoma (ZT) is diagnosed with cancer and kidney failure and Jeny's sister, Johana (ZT), ends up in hospital in the department for drug addicts; she undergoes dialysis. Many other characters fight with depression.

As much as Balabán's characters experience pain or become ill, they also become the healers of their own pain or the pain of others. Some face serious health conditions; others end up working in a hospital or doing a job connected with the life sciences. Father Jan Nedoma (ZT), Karel Chudoba ('Ray Bradbury': MO), Monika Tomská (KSA), Leoš's sister Elena ('U Komunistů': MO), Roman Hradílek ('Prázdniny': PR) and Emil's new girlfriend (ZT) work in a hospital. Kateřina Nedomová (ZT) is a biologist. Dr Satinský ('Proměny': PR) and Dr Kraus are medical doctors ('Cedr a kladivo': MO) and Marie Severinová ('Viadačka': JT) is a natural healer. But Balabán's doctors or healers are not merely seen as the people who treat human bodies. In the eyes of some characters, they are regarded as angels, as saviours of people's souls from the darkness of depression or from death. The first thing that Martin Vrána (KSA) sees after he wakes up from being unconscious is a nurse with a shining smile. Elena, a nurse and Leoš's step sister, comes into Leoš's life ('U Komunistů': MO) at the time he thinks his world is lost in apathy and he seriously struggles to cope with the reality of the present post-communist world. Monika Tomská (KSA) plays the same role in her relationship with Martin Vrána. She is a medical nurse as well as Martin's new love and new hope for a better future. For Kateřina Nedomová ('Hořící dítě': MO, ZT), her father and doctor, Jan Nedoma, is the only person who keeps her in the world of the living while she is struggling with her health problems.

But even Balabán's 'healers' do not live forever. They are also mortal human beings and, as such, they also fall ill and die. Father Jan Nedoma (ZT) dies of a combination of cancer, kidney failure and diabetes and the old doctor, Karel Chudoba ('Ray Bradbury': MO), dies of the consequences of Alzheimer's disease.

In Balabán's works, illnesses and their treatments always co-exist. Where there is an illness or pain, there seems to be always a way to treat it, unless the illness is in the terminal stage. Where there is a death, there seems to be always a new life. Where there is an end of something, there seems to be always a beginning of something new. Kateřina Nedomová ('Hořící dítě': MO) suffers from a serious combination of kidney failure and diabetes and nearly dies had it not been for her father and his faith for her future. Oldřich ('A ptáci taky': MO) has to kill a turkey in order to allow the happy arrival of his first child. Eva (KSA) ends her relationship with Martin Vrána in order to start a new life. And many others experience something similar too.

3.3.2 Death

The question of life and death is crucial in the world of Balabán's characters. Many of them have to put up with death and a harsh reality that comes afterwards and many of them struggle to cope. Světlana's husband, Jiří ('Světlana': JT), dies when he tries to save their daughter in the wild sea. Světlana struggles to find a way back to the social world but, instead, she encloses herself in her self thoughts. Petr Zábranský ('Dona nobis pacem': JT) drinks himself to death. Saša ('Oblak': JT) dies of lung problems. Patricia's mother commits suicide ('Vděčná smrt': JT). Both of her children carry the memory of her death to their own worlds and both of them struggle to accept it and be happy. Bogomil (CB) meets his death in Canada and Johana's fictive hero, Ivo, on a new planet (Ibid.). Mother, grandmother and great grandmother of Štěpán Jařab ('Armageddon': PR) suffocate after their house fills with smoke. Marie's friend bleeds to death during labour ('Výročí svatby': ST). As a result of this, Marie refuses any thought of sexual life.

Death does not bring only tragedy or sadness to Balabán's women and men. Death also means a cleansing process and an open door to a new life, especially if it is a case of an animal's death. In Balabán's works, an animal's death is seen as a sacrifice for those who suffer; it is also their possible way to happiness. A dangerous shark has to be killed in order to save the life of a human ('Žraločí srdce': ST). A cat is 'removed' because, when alive, it reminds its owner of the dangerous effects of sexual life ('Výročí svatby': ST). Killing a turkey brings its performer relief from his fear of birds at a time when he is expecting the arrival of his first child ('A ptáci taky': MO). An animal's death is a real (and symbolic) sacrifice to what humans need. It is also yet another biblical motif that has made its way into the literary work of Jan Balabán (see further below).

In Balabán's texts, death appears in many forms: it can be real (as in the examples above) as well as imagined. During one of his post-alcoholic moments, Emil Nedoma dreams about death ('Emil': MO). In the dream, he plays the role of a lighthouse keeper who is not able to save a man in a boat struggling in the waves at the foot of the lighthouse. The dream is one of Emil's metaphors, an image of his own conscious mind, in which he himself acts as the person who knows that he must keep his 10-litre bottle of clear vodka (his own lighthouse as he calls it) safe but who wrecks the life of anyone who tries to approach him and his world. Emil is an alcohol keeper who observes how people try to get close to him and his habit but, instead of helping them, he destroys them – as he destroyed the unity of his own family. In his thoughts, the end of his relationship with his children and his wife resembles his death. Pavel Nedostál ('Highlander': PR) also thinks of death when, on one of his regular walks with his son, he tells his version of the film story about a highlander, a famous Scottish hero, who became immortal during the course of his life. In his son's imagination, this story provokes a number of questions regarding the mortality of human beings and their deeds.

The sudden presence of illness and death makes Balabán's individuals think – about their own existence within this world and about the world itself. In Kudy šel anděl, Martin Vrána expresses strong anger and accuses society of taking away all joy from people and of destroying them, so that they end up embracing alcohol and lose all that they value and love. He blames society for the death of his good friend, Tonda Góna:

'What am I doing here, what are we all doing here? Slagheaps and housing estates in the fields, high-rise buildings in the countryside, dormitories, barracks and garrisons. Why are you all here? What are you all doing here? Who ordered you to come? (...) You see, Tonda Antifona, it's a fraud, it's a fucking German, Austrian, Jewish, Capitalist, Russian, Communist fraud! To the Ostrava coal mines! Leave your lassie and weans at home and catch the train, to the Přívoz railway station and hurry to the mines! Grab the hammer and enjoy the mining! Three thousand net pay! Build the country and sustain peace! Your children are as dull as alcohol can make them! Fuck your feelings, go to Ostrava! There you will get a factory flat, a bathroom with warm water, a bath tub, sausages and meat, the red Communist membership book and a savings book! Then, they'll hit you on the head with a pipe. All of us are here, piled-up. Here, people live only piled-up. Here they are building a new world. Everyone fucks everyone else, everyone fucks with everyone else.'

[‘Co tu vlastně hledám, co tu vlastně hledáme všichni? Haldy a sídliště na polích, na vesnicích, paneláky, ubytovny, kasárna a garnizony. Proč sem lezete? Co tu všichni chcete? Kdo vás sem nahnal? (...) Vidiš, Tondo Antifono, vidíš ten podvod, zasraný německý, rakouský, židovský, kapitalistický, ruský, komunistický podvod! Banovat do Ostravy! Nech doma robu a děcka a na vlak, na hlavní nádraží do Přívozu a vzhůru do dolů, uchop se každý kladiva a měj se k dolování. Tři tisícky čistá ruka, buduj vlast, posílíš mír, a děti blbé od chlastu. Ser na city, jeď do Ostravy, tam dostaneš závodní byt, koupelnu s teplou vodou, vanu, párky a bůček a červenou knížku a vkladní knížku a trubkou do hlavy. Všichni jsme tu na jedné hromadě, tady se žije jenom na hromadě. Tady se buduje nový svět, tady každý jebe každého, tady každý jebe s každým.'] (KSA: 62)

In the destiny of his friend Tonda, Martin Vrána sees the destiny of all those who forgot about basic human values and have agreed to become just a small cog in the huge machinery of the state. He curses the society which blinds people with false values. He curses himself because he has fallen into the same trap as many others and he is unable to escape.

Death occupies the minds of various Balabán characters, but this theme is explored in the greatest detail in Balabán's last novel, Zeptej se táty, the novel which was coincidentally published after the author's own death. Here, the description of the last days of the old father, Jan Nedoma, is interwoven with reflections and memories of all the people he left behind when he died. His wife, Marta Nedomová, thinks of him greatly but the pain of loss which she experiences is so overwhelming that, for a long time, she cannot even remember the last moments of his life nor can she picture her husband's face alive. She sees her own existence fading without Jan's presence, melting in grief. Hans's memory of his father is transferred into images of the light (remembering the light in the eyes of his dying dad) and the poplar tree (father represented a strong hold for his family; father was that tree – a symbol of health and strength of family life). Whenever Hans recollects his father's fatal illness, he does it in connection with his own life. He thinks about his unsuccessful attempts to create a happy family life and a good career for himself and he expresses pain. He thinks about his father, his father's success in building a family and career and, in connection with this, he looks for the answer to his questions about the meaning of life and death and about the natural balance of things:

'Every moment of happiness, not only chemical happiness, but the real one, is redeemed, I am using this word in an inverted sense, but on purpose, is redeemed by a significantly longer moment of pain. Otherwise we wouldn't be able to want to die.

And do we want to die?

We must want to die, otherwise we will have to want to.'

['Každá chvíle štěstí, nejen chemického, i toho skutečného, je vykoupěna, to slovo teda používám naprosto převráceně, ale schválně, je vykoupěna podstatně delší chvílí bolesti. Jinak bysme ani nemohli chtít umřít.

A my snad chceme?

Musíme chtít, jinak budeme muset.'] (ZT: 46)

With the death of his father, Hans feels he has lost his bearings; when his wife leaves him, he feels he is losing the sense of his being and his courage to fight to retain it. He hides in his own internal thoughts and images.

Emil's perception of his father's death is transferred into the physical sickness he experiences whenever he passes a hospital or a graveyard and it is also associated with painful memories of his own past. Through the recollection of the last visit he paid to his dying father, he thinks of particular moments which have formed his family life and his current attitude to the world. Being hurt by the death of someone so dear to him, he becomes even more attached to God and the people who share their most intimate thoughts with him. He spends hours and hours in discussions with his girlfriend, Jeny and, his sister, Kateřina, and in contemplations of the time they still have left to enjoy:

'Do you think, Katka, that we are already old?
Well, we are not children anymore.
Hans says that you are a child as long as you still have your parents.
That sounds logical.
As does everything Hans says.'
['Myslíš, Katko, že už jsme staří?
No, děti už nejsme.
Hans říká, že člověk je dítě, dokud má rodiče.
To zní logicky.
Jako jsou všechny Hansovy řeči.'](ZT: 109)

And Kateřina adds:

'Moments do not end. Moments last forever. Only we cannot live forever within them.'
['Okamžiky nekončí. Okamžiky pořád trvají, to jenom my v nich nemůžeme pořád žít.'](ZT: 177)

Face-to-face with their father's death, Kateřina and Emil search for the meaning of their lives. They question their past and all that has been left behind after their father's death. Emil clings to his girlfriend Jeny as much as Kateřina does to her children and her illness. Emil expresses his sorrow in thoughts and talks with certain people. Kateřina holds her sadness inside. She recalls everything that her father suffered and sacrificed when she was seriously ill and nearly died, and blames herself for the fact she could not be there for him when he was dying. She remembers her last dialogue with her father; she recalls the places he showed her and the words he said when she was a child. She cannot bear the thought he died without her.

Each of the members of the Nedoma family has a different understanding of their father and his death but one thing they have in common is their attitude to the letters they started receiving immediately afterwards. These letters have been written by their father's former close friend, Wolf. In them, Wolf blames Mr Nedoma for alleged malpractice he committed as a doctor and in respect of God. What happens to people who used to be friends (just as Wolf and Nedoma used to be) but who later separated under the pressure of the outside world?

‘They were such bosom friends. In that godless world of their native working class housing estates controlled by the communists and their militia men, she saw them as two witnesses or apostles of everything she could respect, of everything that separated her from the dull materialism of their schoolmates and neighbours, who weren’t able to see further than to their pay days, than to the borders of their own flats and garages. These two were men who cared for the truth and the meaning of life, life which was given to us so that we would achieve something.’

[‘Takoví byli přátelé. V tom bezvěreckém světě rodného dělnického sídliště ovládaného soudruhy a milicionáři je vnímala jako dva svědky nebo apoštoly všeho, čeho si chtěla vážit, všeho, co ji oddělovalo od tupého materialismu spolužáků a sousedů, kteří nevidí dál než na konec své výplatní pásky, než za hranice svého bytu a garáže. Byli to muži, kterým šlo o pravdu a smysl života, který nám byl propůjčen, abychom v něm něco dokázali.’] (ZT: 51)

Wolf’s unexpected reaction to their father’s death creates great doubt in the minds of all members of the Nedoma family. When facing the written accusations, they all suddenly feel confused and lost. They start doubting their own memories of their father, as well as what seemed to be an unbreakable bond of friendship between their father and Wolf. In order to find out the truth and to understand what actually went on, Kateřina visits the hospital where her father used to work but, instead of being given an explanation, she is told to believe her own memories of her father. In the mind of the mother, Marta Nedomová, Wolf’s letters evoke the long evenings her husband and Wolf spent together discussing politics, God and various moral issues. She recalls the last evening during which both men argued viciously. Wolf’s letters confirm all her doubts and remind her of the arguments that she had with her husband when he was still alive. Wolf’s letters help her to remember. Emil looks for the truth about his father in his dreams. There he stands as a defender of his father’s life against Wolf’s accusations. Emil’s dream replays the time-honoured dispute between a religious code of ethics (Wolf was strongly religious) and a doctor’s loyalty to the Hippocratic Oath. Emil’s dream, however, ends inconclusively – the matter is not resolved and the debate will not continue. In the end, Wolf turns up at Jan’s funeral but no one ever finds out what was the source of his sudden hatred of Dr Nedoma. No one knows whether Wolf’s attacks were motivated by envy (Wolf has never had a proper job), jealousy (his family disintegrated), a different philosophical attitude (to accept the communist regime and be allowed to work as a doctor, or not to accept the regime and not be allowed to work as a doctor) or a different understanding of religion (to forgive or not). In Wolf's character, the Nedoma family faces both the equity and the inequity of society and the world.

3.4 God and the universe

Thinking of life and death brings Balabán's characters to a more persistent consideration of the passing of time, the beginning and the end of human life and its creation. From the first texts that Jan Balabán published, we can observe a strong line in his work that leads from people's minds to God ('God's rope', as the title of Balabán's second prose – Boží lano – indicates). Various individuals turn to God when looking for answers regarding their doubts, when searching for forgotten memories or when looking for a way out of confusion. God and God's creation becomes the subject of their numerous discussions, questions and thoughts.

In Středověk, God takes the form of a light, a non-material being whose presence one can sense but never touch; it is a voice that comes to people from above. Ena ('Ena') is following all the three metamorphoses of God and hopes this will help her to find a way out of her terrible depression, her presumed internal darkness, her solitude and her fear of emptiness. Daniel ('Kde jsi byl, Adame?') is not very happy with the direction in which his life is going and so he questions God. He sees himself as a biblical Adam, a naked man who lost his paradise (the love of his family, his youth) and now he hides away, embarrassed about what kind of human being he has become. Jonáš ('Denatur') contemplates a similarity between himself and Noah – both loved drink and so drank their lives away.

The life of the narrating 'I' presented in Boží lano follows the path of biblical wanderers. In the first part, called 'Americká elegie', the narrator goes back in his memories and recalls all the important moments that occurred in his past before he lost his faith in God. He remembers his childhood and youth, the time before his family moved to a different town; he remembers the New Year celebrations in the church, his first sexual experience and his grandfather, an Evangelical priest from Siberia. He thinks of his first kiss, of his numerous talks with his brother, Daniel. He recollects how his parents were worried about his lifestyle, he looks back at certain moments in school; he remembers children's fairytales and a series of historical events that he has experienced. His memories are interwoven with reflections of his current American lifestyle and with various philosophical and religious contemplations.

The second part of Boží lano, called ‘Studené jaro’, takes us back to the narrator’s early adulthood and his middle-years, but the same litany continues. Only this time, the ‘rope’ of his thoughts is connected with his first work experience in the Czech industrial city of Ostrava and with his unsuccessful marriage. It is spring. The narrator lives beyond the ocean but thinks of his Czech past and of God whom he left behind when he moved away. In the course of his personal meditation, he recites the Ten Commandments and stops at each of them whilst considering his failures, never successes. In the third part of Boží lano – ‘Znamení’ – the narrator sets out on a journey through the labyrinth of his native town. With his girlfriend, he walks through the streets and the quarters he remembers from his childhood. He looks for the church he lost sight of after he had moved away; in the end he finds it. Then, he also finds his faith.

Boží lano is a story of the narrator’s fall to earth (after he had left the realm of his childhood), and of his wandering through a mundane chaos, a labyrinth of his world. It is a story of the narrator’s failures and losses, and his search for a way back. ‘God’s rope’ (‘boží lano’) helps him to find a way. It helps him to find his religious faith (on a journey which leads back to his childhood), his love for his fellow human beings, and peace of mind. In the end, this narrator is able to accept the world in all its shapes and forms, despite the fact that he is still confused.

In Prázdniny, Balabán’s characters also turn their minds to God. The ageing doctor, Daniel Nedostál (‘Nespavost’), thinks of all the ‘godly’ and ‘ungodly’ people he has accompanied from the world of the living to death, whilst he himself sends quiet prayers to heaven before his own time to die comes. Another character, Pavel Nedostál (‘V neděli’), remembers God whenever his thoughts touch his memories of childhood. Seeing his own children enjoying their Sunday mornings in front of the TV, he recalls other Sundays – the time when it was still important to celebrate the seventh day of the week, to clean and decorate the house, put on Sunday clothes, go to church and share a festive meal. His family’s religious tradition observed in the family party seems to him superior to everything he sees around himself today:

‘A perfectly polished shoe doesn’t really exist. But it is an ideal and you can be a step closer to it every Saturday. An enamelled drum in the bathroom spouts out large amounts of hot water into the bathtub. Children go first. Everyone has clean pyjamas. It takes some time to fall asleep. You can still see shadows moving on the ceiling. You hide deep in your duvet. You are scared a bit. You would like to pray a little longer but you fall asleep, with the grace of God.’
[‘Dokonale vyleštěná bota vlastně neexistuje. Ale je to ideál a ty se k němu můžeš každou sobotu o chlousek přiblížit. V koupelně smaltovaný válec chrlí horkou

vodu do vany. Děti jsou napřed a všichni čistá pyžama. Dlouho se neusíná. Jen před chvílí se na stropě posunují stíny. Kutáš se do peřin. Malinko se něčeho bojíš. Chtěl by ses ještě pomodlit, ale už usneš, v milosti Boží.’] (PR: 16)

Pavel Nedostál does not think of God only in connection with his childhood. He considers God in his discussions with his girlfriend, Jeny, who believes in God but despises organized religion (‘Moving into the universe...’), in debates with his friend, Dr Satinský, who does not believe in God and is a believer in science (Ibid.), and in the story of the old man, Timoteus, whose faith was stronger than love for his family and so it destroyed him (‘Vyznavač’).

A large number of Balabán’s characters talk about God but their talk does not produce any satisfactory outcomes, only more doubts. One of the main topics that are often discussed in these talks is the contradiction between a belief in God and a belief in science. In Prázdniny, this is the topic of various debates between Dr Satinský and Pavel Nedostál (‘Moving into the universe...’). In the novel Černý beran, this contradiction is dealt with on different levels. Once again, the conflict of views creates tension between two characters:

“Deus est circulus...” Bogomil pronounced a Latin sentence which no one sitting around the table understood.

“What does it mean in English?”

“God is a circle whose centre is everywhere and whose borders are nowhere.”

“That is interesting.” Amy got suddenly excited. “It reminds me of a definition of the Universe by Stephen Hawking. He says that the Universe is finite but has no borders.”

“But Comenius speaks of God,” Bogomil objected.

“But surely, God and the Universe must be the same thing,” Amy answered quickly.

[‘„Deus est circulus...” Bogomil pronesl latinskou větu, již nikdo u stolu nerozuměl.

„Co to znamená anglicky?”

„Bůh jest kruh, jehož střed je všude a okraje nikde.”

„To je zajímavé.” Amy byla náhle nadšená. „Podobá se to definici kosmu od Stephena Hawkinga. Ten říká, že vesmír je konečný, ale nemá žádné okraje.”

„Jenže Comenius mluví o Bohu,” namítl Bogomil.

„Bůh a vesmír přece musí být jedno,” odpověděla Amy pohotově.>] (CB: 15)

In this example, Bogomil, a Czech emigrant, proudly speaks of God using quotations from work by the 17th century Czech theologian, Jan Amos Komenský⁶¹, a member of the Unity of Brethren⁶², whilst his friend, the Jewish lady Amy, refers to the scientific theories of the universe and the possible unity of both religion and science. Her understanding of the world derives from a religious tradition (Christian and Jewish) and merges with modern scientific views. Debates about God also take place between the same Bogomil and his ex-wife, Johana. Bogomil talks of God and he reads from the Bible while Johana writes a story about outer space and a non-existent planet, Barson. Elsewhere, in the story with the significant title ‘Ray Bradbury’⁶³ (MO), one of the female characters explains the origin of her son’s name, Timoteus, with reference to his father’s Evangelical tradition. She also talks about her and her husband’s shared dream they both had in the past of an escape from Earth to another planet. This dream they quote was partly influenced by Bradbury’s famous The Martians Chronicles (1950).

The ever present tension between God and the universe, between religion and science and between soul and body is also highlighted by the fact that many of Balabán’s characters have either a religious or a scientific profession or interest, or both at the same time. Many of them work in hospitals treating human physical illnesses and diseases (Dr Satinský in ‘Proměny’: PR, Roman Hradílek in ‘Uršula’: MO, Bogomil: CB or Jan Nedoma: ZT). Others are involved in religious activities. Some of them are members of the Church hierarchy (Nedoma’s grandfather was a Protestant priest as was the grandfather of the narrator in BL). Bogomil, the protagonist of Černý beran, represents both religion and science. He works for the ambulance services and constantly studies the Bible. Father Jan Nedoma (ZT) does the same – he works as a doctor but has a strong religious faith.

There is another antinomy that influences the attitude of Balabán’s characters to life and to God. This antinomy arises from different cultural experiences. Going back to the above example, Bogomil’s and Amy’s experience (CB) comes from two different people from two different countries. Bogomil’s roots lie in the world of Czech Protestants. Bogomil comes from a small Czech village called Svěbohov (God’s own place). He left this place in order to escape from his insane wife, Johana, and in order to find peace and regain his faith in God and in himself in a country across the Atlantic Ocean. Despite all his efforts, though, he is frustrated even in America. He claims that America is a country where faith in God is glorified on the surface but it is, in fact, commuted into money, fame and freedom without any rules. Amy is presented as the product of this environment even though she has doubts. Bogomil never accepts the American-Canadian philosophy of life. He joins American society, gets married, makes friends and finds a job but never gives up his memories, his doubts, his private thoughts and his Protestant faith. Until the end of his life, Bogomil never forgets his God; he never refuses to help others and he continues to support his first wife, Johana. He stays loyal to his Czech name which means ‘a lover of God’ and so ‘a lover of people’, although it never brings him the forgiveness he desires so much. At least, this is what Bogomil’s new partner, Jennifer, and his nephew, František Josef, think.

František Josef comes from the same Protestant-Evangelical background. His faith in God is also very strong but, unlike Bogomil, he is not tolerant towards contemporary secular society and the way this society behaves in relation to God and in relation to the human being. He is very critical of the consumerist American society:

‘Americans are colonizers and God supports them. They land somewhere and build a petrol station there. Then cars arrive with men accustomed to live anywhere. (...) A lost paradise with the ghosts of exterminated native Indians who hang around the parked cars. Everyone knows that the devil is as beautiful as New York City, as a Hollywood night bar. A rubbishy place full of celebrities. TV gospels for stupid children, cowardly men and women, drunks who drink martini, masturbate in front of the TV and long for the celebrity devil. And he comes to them and gives them American freedom to be lonely, to be independent of others, to have the right to carry arms and a cheque book, gives them a passport, a lawyer, a psychoanalyst, a priest, Jesus, Santa Claus. The North Americans know that Heaven meets Hell at every corner. If you want to be in Heaven you must stand with one leg in Hell.’
[‘Američané jsou kolonisté, kterým Bůh drží palce. Přistanou a postaví benzinovou pumpu. Pak přijedou vozy a muži uvyklí žít kdekoliv. (...) Ztracený ráj s duchy exterminovaných Indiánů, kteří se poflákují kolem zaparkovaných aut. Každý ví, že ďábel je sličný a krásný jako New York City, jako hollywoodský noční bar. Sajrajt plný hvězd a televizní evangelium pro blbá děcka, pro zbabělé chlapy a ženské, alkoholičky, které pijí martini a onanují u televize a touží po hvězdnatém ďáblu, a on k nim přichází a dává jim americkou svobodu k samotě, dává jim nezávislost na druhých, právo nosit zbraň a šekovou knížku, pas, právního zástupce, psychoanalytika, faráře, Ježíše, Santa Klause. Severoameričané vědí, že nebe se potkává s peklem na každém rohu. Když chceš být v nebi, musíš být jednou nohou taky v pekle.’] (CB: 51)

Hence, by criticizing American society, František Josef actually criticizes society in general. Against the religion of pretentious society he accentuates his faith in God. Against the contemporary times he places the memories of his childhood. He goes back to his past and compares what he remembers with current times. Everything he perceives he then projects onto his relationship with other people: with Patricie, his children, his uncle Bogomil or Czech society in general. František Josef suffers psychological pain when he thinks of the current world and his position within it; he feels sorry for himself; he drinks, talks about God and Jesus, about people's ignorance of his own 'misery', or their 'graceless' behaviour and of the chaos they created for themselves in this life.

It is evident that, unlike Bogomil who found his internal peace before he died, František Josef is still on his search. He still has an urge to express his problems with the world he lives in. He still lives in his childhood memories which he sees as life blessed by God's light:

'The word of God was always hidden for František in the form of a little light in that crude socialism, in that future scrapyard of heavy machinery and absurd mechanisms.'

['V tom hrubém socialismu, v budoucím vrakovišti těžkých strojů a nesmyslných mechanismů bývalo pro Františka slovo boží vždy ukryto jako malé světlo.']
(CB: 111)

Whilst the present is for him just:

'A terrible confusion of a chaotic human world. A mixture of debris and discarded plans scattered about and piled up on top of each other. All over the place.'

['Hrozný zmatek neuspořádaného lidského světa. Chamrad' krámů a plánů poházených a složených přes sebe, od sebe a kolem sebe.'] (CB: 112)

František Josef's thoughts are dark whenever he thinks about the present world. He brightens whenever he thinks of his past and of God. Only with the appearance of a new love in his life, František Josef changes his attitude towards the current world and finds a long forgotten hope. He is no less critical towards the world but embraces it with more optimism than before. Now, his God becomes a God of human hope, a God of the ambiguity of love (Patricie) and death, of Paradise and Hell, of purity and evil, a metaphor of fate. His God is omnipresent. Bogomil is given the peace and strength to build a new life but he is never able to escape his destiny. No matter how hard he tries to undo what he perceives as his 'sins' (running away from his destructive love to Johana), no matter how many trees he plants to celebrate God's creation, no matter how many people he supports, his destiny finds him and finally strikes him down. The same thing happens to Johana's fictive hero, Ivo. He is also struck by God's anger when the forgotten voice of Ivo's love sounds. Johana, the author of the story, is entangled in her madness and creativity. She is out of touch with a world she has never really understood. Only František Josef and Patricie are not touched by any catastrophe. Both accept, although with difficulty, what the world brings them – to Patricie, diabetes and to František Josef, his first failed marriage, but also each other.

In all of Balabán's fiction, we find many references to God and many religious motifs that relate to his characters' everyday experiences. It is God's light that shines on all his individuals if they are able to see it (in the crown of trees, in the eyes of human beings, in the golden letters engraved on people's gravestones, at the end of dark tunnels, in dreams). It is God's rope that is given to all individuals as an invisible connection between God and the world of human. It is a 'vertical line' that, in Balabán's imagery, symbolizes this God's rope and the beginning of all – God's creation. It is love (human love, love of God) that shows the lost and depressed characters a way to their new happiness. It is an ideal Christian world based on strong family bonds (father as a head of the whole family, mother with caring hands, respectful children) that Balabán's characters seek. It is a world in which animals are sacrificed in order to save the lives of humans. It is a journey of biblical wanderers which Balabán's characters take in order to find their lost faith in God (a journey back to the beginning). It is a life as a circle in which the end joins the beginning in the infinity of God's love and the universe.

Almost all of Balabán's characters think about God whether they believe in him or not. However, it is especially men who have the urge to talk about God, to seek out God, to accept God or to deny his existence. Women are more concerned with the stability and health of their families rather than with spirituality of the human self. They take care of what is real to them whilst men always have their heads full of big ideas and philosophical thoughts. Men analyze human existence in its intricacy, instability and finality. The strength of women is derived from the everyday practical world. Once again it applies that, in Balabán's fictive world, women are for others whilst men are for their own selves. But God, if they respond to him, lives in the lives of both women and men. Only women hold their faith in silence.

Balabán's fictive world is a world of spiritual awareness. His characters live in the present time, they are born and they die, but their mind expands to different spheres. It is the alliance of nature, God and the universe that shapes them and they recognize this. They often doubt as they lose a person they loved, home, stability or faith and sometimes they give up completely and choose to die. The majority of Balabán's characters find their hope and, finally, also the way back to life within nature, God and the universe, when they find their love once again. With new love, they find a new life in the present and they try to enjoy it – the same way as they enjoyed their life in the past before they were swallowed by the world of adulthood.

3.5 The present and the past: time and places (external & internal reality)

3.5.1 Memories

Balabán's characters spend a lot of time thinking about their own selves and, whenever they do, they do so through personal memories of their past. In their minds, they go back to their childhood and youth in order to recall those moments that have shaped their personal lives. In replaying these memories in their minds, they seek an explanation for what happened in the past and afterwards, and why certain things did not happen at all. Almost every important character recollects what he/she thinks was a key experience that influenced his/her personality during the course of its formation. Some have to go back to the time when they were still children or young and enjoyed life without any major difficulties and breakdowns. Others recall what came after they started to love, to study, to work and to socialize.

The characters' childhood memories are usually connected with the family and with faith. They are wrapped in the spirit of something mysterious, something that now seems to be almost like a fairytale rather than something from the real world. Characters recall their memories as if they were just someone's innocent dreams where things were still good and in their right place and not as something that really happened. Childhood is seen to have been like an Eden, a paradise; everything that happened afterwards is considered to be a journey through Hell and Purgatory back to God's embrace:

'I missed being a child. But then I saw you between two trees in our courtyard, in the place where a villa used to be. Our high rise blocks of flats were later built in its garden; only the villa foundations remained in the ground and they are still being touched by the roots of those two trees, the trees are wild, now every autumn shedding a whole harvest of unripe pears; pears which then rot on the grass and on the footpaths, wasps feast on them – a hammock was stretched exactly between those two pear-trees, and your little den in it was exactly where there used to be the children's bedroom in the house; a cot was made of carbide tubes and a woollen netting which protected you from falling down onto the hard floorboards. Do you remember this? Walking away from the window I caught again sight of those women, women with massive legs, heavy knees, thighs and big cow-like buttocks; they had breasts as big as wrists and they had big lips and beautiful eyes; Gauguin's women.'

[‘Stýskalo se mi po dítěti a pak jsem tě uviděl mezi dvěma stromy na našem dvoře, dříve mezi nimi stávala vilka, naše paneláky byly postaveny na její zahradě, po vilce zbyly jen základy zasuté v zemi, kde se jich ještě stále dotýkají kořeny těch dvou stromů, stromy jsou zplanělé a každý podzim z nich spadne celá úroda nedozrálých hrušek, které pak hníjí na trávnících a na vyšlapaných cestičkách, jen vosy na nich hodují a mají se dobře – síť byla natažena právě mezi těmi dvěma hrušněmi a tvůj pelíšek v ní byl zrovna tam, kde býval dětský pokoj, postýlka z chromovaných trubek s přízovou sítí, která tě chránila před pádem na tvrdou prkennou podlahu. Pamatuješ si to? Cestou od okna jsem zase zahlédl ty ženy, ženy s velkýma nohama, těžkými koleny, stehny a zadky jako krávy, měly prsy jako pěsti a velké rty a oči krásné, ženy Gauguinovy.‘] (BL: 11)

This particular example is a single memory of the narrating ‘I’ from Boží lano. In Boží lano, we walk with this ‘I’ through the personal interpretation of his life. We follow the self-analysis of his past and note which experiences influenced his perception of his self and the world around him. The whole book is basically a search for a personal understanding of the reality of one man, from the past to the present.

The narrator of this story is a middle-aged man. He takes us deep into the memories of his childhood and early adulthood. He talks about his first loves and family disruptions, his marriage, communist Ostrava, Canada, his relationship with the woman called Donna and his belief in God. The memories of this particular man are the memories of different colours and different shapes. His childhood is seen as a time of pure innocence. There is a villa, there are fruit trees, there is ripe fruit; there are bees and bosomy women (see the example above). There are night shirts and fairytales; there are green cockles and tiny milk-jars. There are churches. No subsequent experience could destroy the clarity of these moments. Not until he grew up enough in order to be able to see the dark side of things. For the narrator, it was sometime between his 10th and 18th birthday when his life changed. He lost his virginity through masturbation and then his first love. The villa was replaced by high-rise blocks of flats, and the trees growing in the former garden went wild. His brother smoked his first cigarettes and family arguments became more intense and louder than ever before. A decision that changed the narrator's life was made: his family gave up the safety of their home town and moved to the industrial city of Ostrava. This was when the narrator finally saw through the veil of his childhood and broke down for the first time:

‘I thought about you when I was still a boy. At night I often couldn't sleep, I was looking out for something, anxiously waiting for something. The light from one of the street lamps behind the window drew an ethereal pattern of the net-curtains on my duvet. It was the net which we can see sometimes fleetingly behind our closed eyes, we see it in the stars that shine in the deep winter sky, in the wrinkles of old people, when they smile at us sometimes at the end of a long day. In such a net I saw you, a small child, who was trying to get the hold of the threads, spun for many years between the point finger and the thumb of eternity. Do you remember that moment, when the net shook as my thought of you crossed it? How old were you then? Only a little light falls on those years now. A shadow is moving across our land. The sun still sets in the west only; the darkness always comes from the east. The world is flat again, like a map and someone's hands keep pushing it away from the sun. The frost of the endless Siberian plains eats the land and we have no choice but to keep moving away. It is the world of the evening into which we, the children of autumn, were born. They say there will be twilight for sixty years. We have to leave our old dwelling places and toil along the roads to follow the copper sun which is always low above the horizon. We are losing things, you know, you cannot pack your life into a suitcase, even people are disappearing, they get on to a different bus and God knows where they end up. If only you knew how anxious I felt once when I stopped under the windows of our flat, breathless from my own game, and understood that there is only a little time left before we leave the place forever, our home, our box, where we used to have everything, even the weak bulbs in the kitchen and the loud conversations which I did not really understand, and the soups which smelled everywhere like my brother's first cigarettes, whose fires floated in the darkness above his bed like the lights of a little firefly whose shirt we both left behind forever. So we had to go through the twilight and I didn't want to do that. I made up stories which I inhabited myself like a primitive man living in a cave; I crouched down by the fire whilst enemies circled around, outside in the damp and cold mist of the forests and swamps.'

[‘Myslel jsem na tebe, když jsem byl ještě chlapec. V noci jsem často nemohl spát, něco jsem vyhlížel, úzkostně jsem něco čekal. Světlo lampy z ulice za oknem prostíralo na moji peřinu nehmotný vzorek záclony. Síť, kterou vídáme jen někdy v prchavých mžítkách za zavřenými víčky, ve hvězdách na hlubokém zimním nebi, ve vráskách starých lidí, když se na nás usmějí na konci dlouhého dne. V té síti jsem tě uviděl, malé dítě, které se ručkama chytá vláken, spřádáných po věky mezi ukazováčkem a palcem věčnosti. Nevzpomeň si na tu chvíli, kdy se síť zachvěla, jak po ní přeběhla myšlenka na tebe. Kolik mi tehdy bylo let? Už jen málo světla padá na ty roky. Naší krajinou se sune stín. Slunce zapadá stále jen na západě a z východu věčně přichází tma. Svět je zase plochý jako mapa a čísi ruce jej stále posunují dál od slunce. Mráz nekonečných sibiřských plání žere zemi a nám nezbyvá než se pořád stěhovat. Je to svět večera, do kterého jsme se my, podzimní děti, narodily. Šedesát let se prý bude jenom stmívat. Musíme opouštět svá stará bydliště a plahočit se za hranatým měděným přízrakem slunce, které je vždycky nízko nad obzorem. Ztrácíme, to víš, do kufru svůj život nenaložíš, i lidé mizí, nasednou do jiného autobusu a kde je jim konec. Kdybys jen věděl, jak úzko mi bylo, když jsem se jednou, udýchaný svou vlastní hrou, zastavil pod okny našeho bytu a pochopil jsem, že jen malinko a už tam nikdy nepůjdem, do našeho domova, do krabice, v níž jsme měli všechno, i ty slabé žárovky v kuchyni a halasné hovory, kterým jsem moc nerozuměl, a polévky, které všude voněly podobně jako první bratrovy potají zapalované cigarety, jejichž ohníčky se vznášely ve tmě nad jeho postelí jako světélko svatojánského broučka, z jeho košilky jsme však už oba nenávratně vyrostli. Tak jsme museli jít soumrakem a já se tomu tehdy na trávníku bránil. Vymýšlel jsem si příběhy a sám jsem je obýval jako pračlověk jeskyni, choulil jsem se u ohně, zatímco venku v sychravé mlze lesů a bažin obcházeli nepřátelé.‘] (BL: 7-8)

The sudden awakening of the narrator in Boží lano during his teenage years did not come only as the outcome of his own momentary personal breakdown. It was also highly influenced by the changes in the political and social structure of society. Judging by the text of the narrative, we may assume that the narrator's childhood corresponds to a period akin to 1960s Czechoslovakia (he says that he studied at a grammar school in 1976). It was not until ten years afterwards that he was sufficiently mature to realize what kind of society he was living in. The narrator characterizes this time as a time close to darkness. He uses images of decay, loss and destruction: rotten fruit, packing, leaving, death (we know that his grandmother died), mist, cold, approaching frost and darkness, winter sky, Siberia. In reaction to all these fatal discoveries, he experiences an anxiety attack (when he learns about his parents' decision to move from his childhood home to Ostrava) or just simple anger (when crossing the road, he drops his school books in the middle of a tram track). What is the worst for him is the realization that nothing will ever be the same again, that everything flows, and he struggles to accept it. In the last gesture of denial, he starts to create his own stories which are different from the stories of the real world and, in these stories, he also tries to live. These stories become his escape from the reality of the present world and from the reality of the world of adults. They are his connection to childhood and to the time before all the troubles (and doubts) started. That is why he holds on to them as long as time allows.

It is his move into the new town that the narrator sees as a step away from his childhood towards the hostile world of adulthood. The new town brings a completely new life to him. It gives him a job (the same one he holds for ten years); he meets (and loses) his first wife there; this is where he fights for his brother (an alcoholic) and drinks himself; there he forgets his personal dignity and faith and there he eventually gets also his passport to the West:

'I was always a bit of a lame duck, always a little moody. I rummaged through the old corners, the old coats, my stuff... (...) I kept running away, to pubs and abroad, to the places which allowed me to give small things big names; I talked rubbish and pumped and kept building a precarious world which was, they said, only all about me. And then I rolled around the floor in the hall calling myself an imprisoned soul and my wife didn't know how to love me; with a hangover, I rushed to catch my tram and in sorrow I whispered the names of my children.'

[‘Vždy trochu zajíknutý, vždy trochu rozmrzelý. Prohrabával jsem staré kouty, staré kabáty, ten svůj materiál. (...) Utíkal jsem pryč, do hospody, do ciziny, kde jsem nazýval malé věci velkými slovy, plácal jsem a pumpoval a stavěl tak vratký svět, který prý byl jen o mně. Potom jsem se válel v předsíni na podlaze a nazýval se vězněnou duší a moje žena nevěděla, jak mě mít ráda, a s hlavou plnou kocoviny jsem pospíchal na tramvaj a lítostivě si šeptal jména svých dětí.’] (BL: 21)

When recalling the memories of his life in Ostrava, the narrator recalls the atmosphere of his hopeless wanderings through the “desert” of his soul (see the example above) as he felt it during these years. Everything seemed to have broken down by then, all his youthful idealism had been swallowed by the grey routine of everyday reality: job, wife, children, a house and eventually also a pub. He realized that, as many others around him, he lived the ‘normalized’ life of a ‘normalized’ society in ‘normalized’ times and he hated it. For a long time, he kept escaping into alcohol and to foreign countries until he settled abroad, on the American-Canadian border. There he found a new house with a view overlooking Lake Ontario. He also met a new girlfriend, Donna. However, the move to America does not give him happiness either. He appreciates the beauty of the environment but misses the familiarity of his Czech home. Even when he travels, he keeps choosing places which somehow remind him of his Czech past. He likes Pittsburgh because, in a certain way, he finds it being like Ostrava – it is also a former steel-making city located on the junction of several rivers. He mentions Hamilton (which is also a steel-making city), Toronto (a city with a large Czech population), and Cleveland (a city with a large Slovak population). He visits the Carnegie museum but thinks there of the Czech girl he first dated. In his Toronto house, he looks in the mirror but, instead of his own reflection, he sees the portraits of all the members of his family who remained in Czechoslovakia.

No matter how much the narrator of Boží lano tries to enjoy his life overseas, his memories keep coming back. Over and over again, he is examining his past and looks for any explanation of what happened between his childhood and the present. And finally, he starts giving names to memories that never had any, for they lay hidden in his mind. However, in order to make his real and symbolic return complete, the narrator has to make one more step – he has to go back to the Czech Republic, to the place he had left, because there he thinks all his life’s wanderings started, and so he does go back (in the third part of the book). Together with his girlfriend, he walks through the streets of Ostrava-Vítkovice, passing the places he knew well. He still recognizes them. He searches for the lost Evangelical church and for his forgotten faith until he finds it. At this point, we leave both these characters to their fate – in a fusion of the narrator’s old European Evangelic faith, his partner’s Catholicism, her mythological dreams and the experience of a city of steel beneath a red sky.

Similar journeys into the past are undertaken by the majority of Balabán’s characters. Yet the story of each of them is always different. The female narrator of the story, ‘Niagarské vodopády’ (ST), remembers how it happened that she ended up working as a public toilet attendant – she remembers her downfall and her unhappy attempts to get up and live again. Marie, from 'Výročí svatby' (ST), recalls the reasons for her aversion to sex – she recalls the moment that changed her life completely. One day in August, Daniel, the protagonist of the story, 'Kde jsi byl, Adame?' (ST), sets out for a walk with his son. The landscape to which he takes him evokes the memories of another summer and another walk. It was his last summer before the reality of the August 1968 Soviet occupation broke into his young life and into the lives of others, and disrupted them. In search of his lost identity, the protagonist of 'Men' (ST) climbs up a hypothetical pyramid, re-living all the levels of his previous conscious and unconscious experiences. He goes back as far as his birth and, on the way there, he chases mysterious creatures, metamorphoses of his own dark self.

3.5.2 The perception of time - linear and cyclic, destroyed and re-built

In Balabán's works, time flows in two directions: forward as the life of individual characters is also moving forward, and backwards as the minds of the individual characters keep wandering back to their past in order to seek the understanding of the present world and their own individual position within it. In Boží lano, the narrator returns to the place where he lost his faith in order to re-discover it and connect the future and the past in a fusion of a dual peaceful present (his and his partner's). It has been already mentioned that the protagonist of 'Men' (ST) seeks some understanding of his current life in his travels in his subconscious mind. In Prázdniny, the passage of time in the narrations of certain individuals is interrupted by a number of breaks. The lives of Balabán's characters are presented there in several episodes. These episodes do not follow each other sequentially but often overlap in both time and place. In 'Proměny', Dr Satinský reveals what preceded his alcoholic breakdown and what happened after he made a decision to stop drinking. There is only a hint about his future travelling. In 'Je to jako děcko', we are suddenly with Dr Satinský on the motorway. He is driving a car whilst drifting into the memories of his journey across America (time after his life with Taťána). Later in the book, Dr Satinský takes us for a visit to his insane artistic aunt, Natálie ('Natálie') and, under the impact of her stagnant existence, he uncovers another part of his childhood (the year 1966). In the story 'Pilot', Satinský sits in the pub with his then girlfriend, Taťána (he was dating her during his alcoholic period), and talks to her about another memory, this time going back to his study years deep in the socialist era. Then, we meet Dr Satinský while he is walking with his grown-up son who is now, after his parents' divorce, living with his mother (the time after his alcoholic period). Dr Satinský's personal story is partly interwoven with another character, his friend Pavel Nedostál ('Pilot'). However, the reader gets to know Pavel Nedostál much earlier, in some of the previous chapters, and again this is happening in several episodes. This time it is done in sequence which is interrupted only by minor unspecified breaks and a few personal memories: Pavel, in the presence of his wife, comments on their ongoing argument. He also mentions their children who are sleeping in the next room, comparing their games with his own childhood memories ('V neděli'); Pavel and his children set out for the New Year's Eve walk to Ostrava-Svinov in order to avoid his wife's criticism ('Silvestr Svinov'); Pavel and his son, Ludvík, visit an old amphitheatre ('Highlander'); Pavel is writing a letter but he is interrupted by his thoughts about his new girlfriend, Jenovéfa (Jeny), and about their discussion regarding the consequences of religious belief ('Vyznavač'); Pavel, during one of his night-walks with Jenovéfa, debates love, God and the Universe with her ('Moving into the universe...'). Finally, Pavel is sitting in a pub observing people around him and thinking of Jeny, his future and his dreams ('Lední medvěd Telecomu'). This is all we learn about Dr Satinský's and Pavel's lives, the rest stays hidden in the memories of both.

Time is formally disrupted in the novel, Kudy šel anděl. The story opens with chapter 19 and with a description of Martin's solitude in his empty flat. Only then do we go back to the beginning and learn about the time when all Martin's troubles started.

3.5.3 Time and place - the external reality

In the world of Balabán's fiction, time is a category of an ambiguous – external and internal – quality, as it is in the real world. It is linear when it follows events in the external world; it is cyclic when it follows many of the characters' returns. A category of place follows the same pattern. It is real when people inhabit it in a particular moment in their lives; it becomes a reflection of their mind, a memory when people think about it through recollections of their past. Balabán's people relate to both the external and the internal reality regardless of whether they talk about it or keep silent.

The external reality in which Balabán's characters live (and which they also create) also determines their internal worlds. In many ways, it influences their decisions about day-to-day things and their future as well as their thoughts about these things and their future. External reality is the world that lies outside the character's personality but involving it. It is the reality that exists despite the personal life of each individual (i.e. the country's political and economic structure; history), but it is also the reality of each particular individual (i.e. his/her social background and his/her personal self in relation to others and the self; personal history). How much the outside world determines each particular character and how much it is their own personal making is different with each individual.

For example, in Prázdniny, the two frequently mentioned protagonists (Pavel Nedostál and Dr Satinský) hardly ever make any comments on the reality of the place and the time that defines them. They seem to be fully preoccupied with their own individual existence within the world. Dr Satinský ('Proměny'), a doctor of the life sciences working at an institute of microbiology, loses his job as a result of personal failure (his extramarital affair brought him family quarrels, alcoholism and divorce). His dismissal is not a direct consequence of adversity in the external world, of the fact that Satinský lives under an authoritarian regime, but a consequence of his own making. Satinský never blames the external world for the loss of his job and his overall failures. He hardly connects anything that has been happening in his life with the policies of the Czechoslovak communist regime and with the outside world. Only once does Satinský really look back at the communist era:

'Students Ivan Satinský and Pavel Nedostál and their girl-friends were sharing a table. Satinský and Nedostál swore at the Communists. They wore loose jumpers. They had second-hand books and ideas which then seemed to matter to them. They were enjoying the pleasant, cosy feeling that they were outcasts – this feeling will never come back – and the two pretty girls were somehow naturally on their side.'

['Studenti Ivan Satinský a Pavel Nedostál seděli u stolu se svými kamarádkami a nadávali na komunisty. Měli vytahané svetry a knihy z antikvariátu a ideje, na kterých jim tehdy nějak záleželo. Bavili se v útulném vyvrženeckém pocitu, který se už nevrátí, a dvě pěkné dívky byly jaksi samozřejmě na jejich straně. '] (PR: 57)

However, even this scene does not expand into anything more than what it is: it is a memory which serves as a point of departure for another memory, this time a story about an awkward meeting with a drunken war pilot ('Pilot') that took place in a similar pub several years previously. At another time, Satinský gives his views about American society ('Je to jako děcko') but, once again, these views serve only as a vehicle for his own thoughts about the nature of human life. Another character, Pavel Nedostál, seems to be concerned about the reality outside his head when he describes the unsatisfactory behaviour of his children and compares it to what he saw as the purity of his own childhood, a childhood in which there was no space for TV and Sunday TV cartoons ('V neděli'). Even so, Nedostál is not interested in pointing out the current problems in society either. His remarks about contemporary society also serve him as a vehicle to express his own doubts about the human self:

‘Can a person feel both good and bad at the same time? God knows.’
[‘Může být člověku zároveň dobře i špatně? Bůh ví.’] (PR: 17)

The majority of Balabán’s characters display similar attitudes to the reality in which they live. They do not deny that they are influenced by the time in which they live but, instead of perceiving themselves as victims of a particular era (the period akin to normalization and the fall of communism in Czechoslovakia), they consider their lives in more general terms and as a never-ending struggle between two contrary forces: good and evil. It is these forces which, as they believe, shape their lives in the first instance; only afterwards it is the external world which they experience in a particular moment of their existence. The present is where the powers of good and evil meet and materialize.

Yet the same does not hold true for all of Balabán’s characters. There are some individuals who sense the impact of the external world on their internal selves to a certain degree and then they talk about it. This, for example, applies to some of the characters in the novel, Černý beran: Bogomil, Johana, František Josef and Patricie. One of the main narrative lines of the novel follows a relationship between two very different individuals, Bogomil and Johana, and their fatal love. Johana is the daughter of a famous Czech legionnaire who fought against the Austro-Hungarian Empire in Russia during the First World War. The legionnaire brought a large Russian girlfriend back from Siberia. Their marriage was never approved by the father’s family, not even after both of them were thrown into prison under the communists. Johana, who was born when Czechoslovakia was occupied by Nazi Germany, was placed into the care of her brutal and hateful uncle after the Second World War. She did not know her parents well and the only ‘care’ she experienced in childhood was the aggressive behaviour of this uncle, a former guerrilla fighter, who himself was traumatized because his wife had eloped with an American soldier. When Johana grew up, she fell in love with Bogomil, a strong man from the neighbourhood, but their relationship was too complicated for them to survive as a couple. Johana’s traumatising experiences made her ill with schizophrenia. She became an original artist but also came to believe that she was being pursued by secret agents. Bogomil could not stand this and ran away, first to Europe, then to Canada.

From the above summary of her life, it is apparent that Johana’s personality was shaped by many forces, political forces included. Without the impact of external political pressure, she would hardly have become the person she was, with all her complications and illnesses. She is a victim of her past and all the changes which Czech society went through during the course of the twentieth century. She is a product of two different cultures which clashed in her society. Their clash crushed her. She is a victim of violence which people practised for the sake of their own sanity and this made her go insane. Furthermore, Johana thinks she lives in a society of spies that follow her and her partner. She does not believe anyone who approaches her; she despises anything that comes from the West; she does not accept anything except her own thoughts. She locks herself away in a cottage far from civilization and there she paints out her memories, over and over again. She hides herself in a world of timelessness which is filled only with the images from her own mind. And in this world, she writes a story of universal love between two fictive heroes, Ivo and Ema, a love story that never really ends.

While Johana escapes into her own fantasy, Bogomil, her husband, runs away from his past. While Johana is unable to overcome her trauma and, instead of moving forward, she looks back, Bogomil sets out for a new life in America. However, his mind stays at home. He keeps helping Czech immigrants in the US in spite of the fact that they take him for granted. He takes many pictures by Johana with him to the US and keeps sending her the best paints he can find as well as money. She never accepts them. Their common experience of the world keeps them connected and hardly allows anyone else to come near. In this sense, their experience becomes universal; it crosses the frontiers of time and place. Yet, it is individual too. Johana's vision of society is full of suspicion; Bogomil's is modest and full of hope and faith.

František Josef is another character whose personal story we follow in the novel, Černý beran. František Josef is Bogomil's nephew and so he is a generation younger than Bogomil. He grew up in communist Czechoslovakia, living and working in Ostrava. He is divorced but in a relationship with Patricie who is younger than him. We do not really know much about his family and about his childhood, his focus is basically on the present time.

František Josef does not present himself as a happy character. The reader meets him at the stage when his thoughts are preoccupied with his personal failure and his inability to recover. His view of the world and society around him reflects the negativity of his thoughts and is full of anger and hatred. František Josef feels he lives in a cruel world. This is how he presents it to his readers:

‘Such a murder. Such a woman. A porous face, bulky earlobes, a perm. She stares like someone who has just been slapped and who wants to slap. She stretches her nostrils and curves her lips. What has happened to her, that cow? She holds her handbag tightly on her knees, so rudely apart. She does not care. Her head is full of problems. Broken nerves. (...) Children scream here and that girl over there, everything she wears seems to be a little too big or too small for her, as if someone had touched her figure, created by God, with messy hands. Look at that awful pimple below her bottom lip, she keeps touching it all the time. Well, if you ever find a husband! You will. There is one. He had his head shaved and is proud of it. Fat nasal bone. He wants to look brutal but at the same time he keeps fidgeting, as if he forgot to wipe his bum in the morning. And here is a young mum, we should look up to her as if she was Virgin Mary, with dyed hair and shiny elastic clothes, necklaces, bracelets and rings and a baby wrapped in something that reminds you of a crimped yarn. He is teasing her, messing around with a lollipop and the mum, the mum's face reflects her wish to switch him off, like she would do with a walkman, with chicken tamagochi, which dies after nine days and its spirit flies to the digital heaven, then you can turn it on again, people say you need a small slip of paper to do it. Slip of paper! And who will pay for that? A chap in a waistcoat asks. He is on the way home from the doctor who made him able to work again. He is so angry that a single look of his eyes gives you a blow. Do not stare at me, you fucking bastard! Do you get it?

[‘Taková vražda. Ženská. Pórovité lice, tlusté boltce, trvalá. Dívá se, jako by byla právě zfackovaná a sama chtěla fackovat. Roztahuje chřípí, křiví rty, co se jí stalo, babě? Drží kabelu na kolenou, tak vulgárně jí jdou od sebe. Je jí to jedno. Starostí nad hlavu a nervy v prdeli. (...) Děti tady řvou a támhle ta holka, všechno je na ní trochu velké nebo trochu malé, jako by její bohem stvořenou formu někdo tak nějak pošahal. A ještě ten strašný uher pod spodním rtem. Pořád si na něj musí sahat. No, ty jestli se vdáš! Ale vdáš. Támhle máš ženicha. Nechal se ostříhat dohola a je na to hrdý. Tlustý kořen nosu. Snaží se vypadat brutálně, a přitom se tak podivně kroutí, jako by si ráno špatně vytřel zadek. A mladá maminka, k té bychom měli všichni vzhlížet jako k madoně, s odbarvenou kšticí a v lesklé elastice, řetízky, náramky, prsteny a děcko v čemsi z umělé přize. Otravuje a patlá lízátko a mamka, mamka se tváří, že by ho nejradši vypnula jako walkmana, jako kuře tamagoči, které po devíti dnech zdechne a jeho dušička odletí do digitálního nebe, pak si ho můžeš pustit znovu, strká se tam prý nějaký papírek. Papírek! A kdo to zaplatí! Ptá se chlap v bundě do pasu. Jde od doktorky uschnutý do práce, našťvaný tak, že ještě jeden pohled a už ji máš, pěstí mezi oči. Nečum na mě, kurva! Rozumíš?’] (CB: 20-21)

František Josef describes Czech society with a sarcastic eye. He applies his scathing criticism to everyone who happens to be around. In his momentary state of mind, people are pictured as ugly, pretentious, rude and faithless. Places are dirty and dull.

The criticism, František Josef expresses, is directed solely at the present world. As opposed to this, his memories are mostly bright and so he keeps going back to them. He sees his past as bright, sincere and full of faith. In his view, it was the time when the adults' problems were still far away from his childish mind and when churches were still welcoming each human soul. But current society is seen as a wasteland. It is a society without direction, the churches are deserted, and individuals are left on their own, unprepared for the difficulties that life brings and human relationships reflect. František Josef feels angry thinking about his own personal failure, about the failure of Bogomil's and Johana's relationship, about his relative, Vlastimil, who was destroyed by his family, about the Czech immigrants who befriended Bogomil only to get some benefit from him. František's resentment sweeps the world; it does not embrace only Czech society but society in general:

'Ontario, Ostrava, Bystřice, where exactly do people live? Where is that home? Is it possible they took it away from us a long time before we were born? Or is this just one of those bad days when something has happened with the optic lens? Everywhere you look there are ugly people. Where did all the beautiful people go?' ['Ontario, Ostrava, Bystřice, kde vlastně lidé žijí? Kde je ten domov? Nevzali nám ho už dávno před narozením? Anebo je jen špatný den, kdy se něco stalo s optikou. Všude jen samí hnusáci. Kam se poděli ti krásní?'] (CB: 21)

In order to find himself at peace with the world, František Josef must return to the places where his life journey started and he must take his new partner, Patricie, with him. But when this happens, he realizes that the reality looks much different from what he remembers and definitely different from what he has described to Patricie, and Patricie takes these findings carefully into account, quoting:

'If only I knew what he is looking for, Patricie sighed. A crazy walk around the old slag heaps and Josef's reminiscences of a world that has disappeared. On the asphalt highway, he speaks about country cottages and weeping willows. He argues that a river in which he used to bathe now runs in the pipes buried under the surface of the road. At the foot of the slag heaps, cows used to feed and people camped. There were ponds and green fisherman's huts, summer houses, groves where strawberries blossomed, and gardens full of beetroot and rhubarb. And there, where there is nothing now, there was a gymnasium and a cinema. (...) He is tormenting her with his disappeared world of which he sees only grey, dusty, grim slag heaps. Everything is hidden behind it, behind the old heap that reminds you of a rusty saw before which people must retreat because it moves slowly but surely towards them, like a Russian tank. This is how Patricie sees it. She faces the approaching nothingness with her back to an uncertain future.'

['Kdybych tak věděla, co vlastně hledá, povzdechla si Patricie. Bláznivá procházka kolem staré haldy a Josefovo vyprávění o zmizelém světě. Na asfaltové dálnici povídá něco o venkovských domcích a smutečních vrbách. Tvrdí, že v trubkách pod silnicí teče říčka, ve které se kdysi koupal. Pod hromadami strusky se prý pásly krávy a tábořili nějací lidé. Byly tam rybníky a zelené rybářské boudy, letohrádky, háje, ve kterých kvetly jahody a zahrady s řepou a rebarborou. A tam, kde teď není nic, byla sokolovna a kino. (...) Tak ji trápí svým ztraceným světem, z něhož ona vidí jen šedivou, prašnou, nahoře zubatou haldou. Všechno je schováno za ní, za starou haldou připomínající rezavou pilu, před níž musí dva lidičkové ustupovat, protože se k nim sune pomalu, ale jistě jako ruský tank. Tak to vidí ona, Patricie. Čelem k postupující nicotě a zády k nejisté budoucnosti.'] (CB: 97)

In the old slag heaps, František Josef sees groves full of strawberries, gardens full of beetroot and rhubarb and ponds. In the asphalt highway, he sees country cottages and weeping willows. In the deserted piece of land, he sees a gymnasium and a cinema. Patricie sees only a grey and dusty old heap. She sees the present, František Josef his past. The picture both of them see on their trip is incredibly sad because it shows the world in decline, but it is essential for their understanding each other and their own selves. Only in the decline of František Josef's past (as it is especially him who is stuck there) they have a chance to find their future together and move on. And both of them seem to know this well.

The story of Balabán's novel, Kudy šel anděl, is also set in Ostrava, where all the main characters live and work. The novel explores these characters' personal narratives from the beginning of their early adulthood until their mid-years. It follows the characters' experience of communist Czechoslovakia, of the fall of communism and the years afterwards; it comments on the state of the past and the current society, and on the environment in which people search for their personal happiness. Ostrava is described as a place of grey slag heaps, destroyed forests, high-rise housing estates and steelworks; it is a place to which people moved because they had been promised a job, money, a flat and presumed freedom. Instead, they had to squeeze in the buses transporting masses of steelworkers and miners in and out of work; instead, they had to look for places of intimacy between industrial pipes and dust from the coal waste; instead, they had to live within small flats in identical square houses called Stage 4. Such was communist Ostrava in the eyes of Martin Vrána, the main character of the book, and it was not happy. However, democratic Ostrava after the fall of communism does not seem to be any better; quite the contrary. The prefab houses remain the same and, instead of nurseries and schools from the times of communism, people opened casinos, second hand shops, pawnbrokers, pubs and shops selling wine from the barrel. The steelworks and the coal mines were closed down. People were made redundant and have ended up on social benefits. Young graduates frequent the local job centres. Everyone drinks and everyone has the latest mobile phone. Where is the place for Balabán's characters amongst them? Martin Vrána has a job which he does not particularly enjoy. He is divorced, living alone on the housing estate. He is unhappy and he drinks. His new partner, Monika, whose family has disintegrated, has problems with self-confidence. Martin's ex-partner, Eva, suffers from lack of family life. She avoids everyone who could become more intimate with her than she could bear until she ends up as a single mother with a successful job. Her lover, Ivan, is a victim of the post-communist regime change. So is his father. Martin's ex-schoolmate, Tonda Góna, just drinks in the local pubs.

In Kudy šel anděl, Balabán's reality is once again seen as destructive and Czech society in decline. Refuge from the estranged world can be found only in love. And so the only people who eventually experience happiness are people in love – Martin and Monika, and Ester and her partner, Pavla. Nevertheless, the world Balabán describes in this novel is as hostile and cruel as people allowed it to be. The individuals succumb to its chaos. They get lost and often break down. Those few of them who find within themselves the strength to accept it gain confidence and are eventually able to appreciate the diversity of life. Others are lost.

Balabán's last three works are set in the same environment. Again, in these works, individuals find themselves in a struggle between the romantic memories of their childhood and the ferocity of the adult years that followed. The present is seen as hostile and is bitterly criticised. In the view of Balabán's characters, contemporary Czech society is under the pressure of imposed political and economic changes and it is unhappy. There is no enthusiasm and there is hardly any hope. Balabán's people are tired from living in the cages of the prefab housing estates and from ideological pressure. They are exhausted from life in the city of Ostrava, full of remnants of the coal and iron industries, heaps of waste and industrial pipes which cross the last remaining patches of greenery. They bend to the gravity of their own existence and they repeatedly escape from it to the timelessness of their childhood memories, to alcohol, to dreams or to other fictive stories they have created from their personal misery. They hold on to their own inner world in which they keep losing themselves in the moments of their worst crisis. Everyday reality is questioned, faith, life and death too.

One more thing which is closely related to the individual's perception of the external world is questioned in Balabán's last work, Zeptej se táty, and that is an individual's responsibility for the truth, an individual's dignity and an individual's respect for the lives of others and for life in general. It is the question which all members of the Nedoma family must answer in relation to their deceased father if they want to understand him and his personal world. Should they believe the letters in which their author, father/husband Nedoma's ex-friend, Wolf, accuses the old Nedoma of betraying the human idea of freedom and his faith? Should they believe his words that the old Nedoma betrayed his own personal dignity when he started to cooperate with those who represented the leading political power of the communist society, deceiving practices and lies? Or, should they believe the old Nedoma's colleague, a doctor-specialist working in the same hospital, who weights Nedoma's actions more than Wolf's accusations because he was convinced that his decisions were made for the good of human beings and their health and not for Nedoma's own profit? Or, should they believe their own memories of their father/husband? It is an individual's decision against the powers of the system which is at the centre of the whole debate over the old Nedoma's life testimony, the debate which occupies the mind of many individuals who experienced life under the pressure of the communist regime. What is more important – an individual's life or an individual's freedom? What is more human – saving lives of people who suffer from serious physical condition and without this essential treatment they would die (Nedoma) or keeping the people's souls away from a fall to deceit and lies (Wolf)? Can these two things be separated? The answer to all these questions lies only in the heart of each member of Nedoma's family and in his/her will to understand.

It is not only the old father Nedoma who is, in Balabán's world, put in front of the decision to co-operate with the leading communist regime and keep the job or not to co-operate and leave. There is also Hans Nedoma's old professor Šrámek (ZT) who has to decide between his teaching and his own belief and faith. Šrámek is described as a person whose only passion was always teaching Czech language and literature to students in local grammar school and practicing his Catholic faith. When he is told to choose between his teaching and his religious practices, he chooses his teaching. In order to keep his place in a local school, he 'betrays' his faith and, as he is told, delivers lectures about atheism. For the leading communist regime, this is a satisfactory precaution to keep the professor under control. Unfortunately for the professor, this decision is well criticized by the new post-communist regime. With the arrival of democracy, the old professor is dismissed exactly for his presumed 'co-operation' with the previous regime and he ends up unemployed and, without any possibility to teach, he slowly passes away.

In the characters of the old father Nedoma and the old professor Šrámek, Balabán sees the tragedy of the contemporary world. His characters live in the world which creates opportunities for each human being but which steps on each decision they make. It is the world which brings every individual to the crossroads with their personal lives and which forces them to make choices against their own beliefs in return for a satisfactory and safe existence. And it does not matter whether his characters live under communism or in the democratic society. The machinery of the outside world never stops and it never leaves anyone aside. Every choice the individual makes is weighted from both sides. No one can only be good and no one can only be bad. Everyone can only be both.

In Balabán's fictive world, every human being is both a winner and a victim of his/her own choices. The outside world is only the result of these choices and, in effect, also its main determinant.

3.5.4 Places discovered and re-discovered - the city v the countryside

The role that the outside world and, especially, particular places play in the lives of Balabán's characters has considerable significance for our understanding of the characters and their perception of reality. Of primary importance in Balabán's texts is Ostrava, a city agglomeration in the Moravian-Silesian region in the north-eastern part of the Czech Republic. This is where the vast majority of Balabán's characters live their adult age. From an historical point of view, we know that Ostrava was the city that attracted many people from all around the country by its fast developing heavy industry (mining, steelworks), by an extensive construction programme and by providing a large number of people with work.⁶⁴ People from agriculture based regions moved to Ostrava looking for a better life and Balabán's heroes did the same. However, the prosperity of the town did not last forever. It was closely connected to the communist state and so, when the communist regime collapsed, the city lost its industrial importance and the quality of life of the local residents deteriorated. Balabán's texts assume a highly critical attitude to these developments and to the current state of Ostrava. They create an image of 'a city of "brutally sharp-edged housing estates built on mud", of cheap bars and pubs, stinking rivers and inhuman teachers' ['město brutálně ostrohranných, z bahna vyrostlých sídlišť, laciných barů a knajp, páchnoucích říček a nelidských učitelek'] (Balabán: Štolba 2003: Host, vol.7: 17-20). They describe a place 'marked by hard labour, alcohol and animal-like pettiness, a city which, under its surface, hides a damaged pride of human estates, exiled human warmth and a kind of imploring, inhospitable magic' ['místo poznamenané ubíjející tvrdou prací, chlastem a živočišnou malostí, jež však pod povrchem skrývá i poničenou stavovskou hrdost, vyhoštěnou lidskou vřelost, jakési úpěnlivé nehostinné kouzlo'] (Ibid.). They see the city that spreads around old slag heaps, corroding steel pipes, closed mines and factories, and slowly deteriorating children playgrounds (see Patricie's vision of Ostrava in CB presented in the previous chapter). They describe a city of lost souls living their lost lives in the places which lost their former beauty and their former sense of existence in the exchange for the idea of a better lifestyle and, later, for the idea of a democratic world:

⁶⁴ After 1945 and through the 1950s, Czechoslovakia concentrated on the development of mining, the steel industry and other areas of heavy industry. Ostrava became its centre, becoming that period's 'city of coal and iron' and also the 'steel heart of the republic'. In 1949, construction was started on the vast Nová Huť industrial complex in Ostrava-Kunčice. A massive support of heavy industry meant an influx of new workers to Ostrava and its vicinity. Many new neighbourhoods grew up in the peripheral quarters of the town at that time. In <http://www.ostrava.cz/jahia/Jahia/site/ostava/lang/en/ostava/o-meste/historie-mesta-ostavy>.

'He got off at the stop between the blocks of tenement houses built in the 1950s. He crossed the street and sat on the bench in the shadow. He did the same thing every day. (...) An old woman would be looking down at him from the second floor window of the opposite house for five minutes. (...) she would always be staring at the same thing. She would be looking at the houses built during the years of the construction period which aimed to build a new city for new people creating a new world. She would probably be one of those new people who first had use of their own bathroom and central heating here; who first experienced their first supermarkets, health centres and community centres for working class here. Facades which were originally brightly yellow are rusty today looking like an old metal plate. Infantile graffiti picturing mothers with infants in their arms, fathers as workers in overalls, singing soldiers and especially children are still there. Those children were our kids, still playing games, studying and dancing there. Only their ghostly spirits remained on these shabby walls. At school we were taught that, after the American bombs exploded in the city of Hiroshima, only the spirits of people remained on the walls. That's why we have to fight for peace, to study, to work and to celebrate with dance so that we do not leave those ghosts which that woman from the second floor can still see linger.

It may be that this woman can only see the same old graffiti. She grew old with them and she did not even notice that the children had already gone. But surely she must have noticed that there are no children playing here anymore, not even her own children whom she raised; children who played with the swings and on the climbing frames. Remains of these climbing frames are still sticking out from the grass plots, of no use to anyone anymore. What used to be nurseries have turned into cheap bars, casinos and pawnbrokers. Grimaces of bright coloured Jolly Jokers can now be seen everywhere promising great jackpots to everyone.'

[‘Vystoupil na zastávce mezi činžáky postavenými v padesátých letech. Přešel přes ulici, usedl na lavičku ve stínu, jako každý den. (...) Pět minut se na mě bude z okna v druhém patře protějščího domu dívat stará paní (...) ona se dívá pořád na to samé. Na domy postavené v letech budování nového města pro nové lidi, kteří budovali nový svět. Ona bude asi z těch nových lidí, co tady poprvé poznali blaho vlastní koupelny, ústředního topení, samoobsluhy, zdravotního střediska a kulturního domu pro pracující. Fasády, kdysi vesele žluté, jsou dnes rezavé jak starý plech. Ještě pořád nesou infantilní sgrafita znázorňující matky s nemluvnaty v náručí, otce dělníky v montérkách, vojáky s písní na rtech a hlavně děti, děti, naše děcka si hrají, učí se a tancují. Na zašlých zdech zůstaly jen jejich stíny. Ve škole nás učili, že v Hirošimě po výbuchu americké bomby zůstaly na zdech stíny po odpařených lidech. A proto musíme bojovat za mír, učit se, pracovat a tancovat, aby po nás nezůstaly takové stíny, jaké teď vidí ta paní z druhého patra.

Možná ta sgrafita vidí pořád stejná. Jak tu s nimi zestárla, ani si nevšimla, že děti už jsou pryč. Ale to si musela všimnout, že tu nejsou žádné děti, ani ty její, které tu uživila a vychovala, které si hrály na houpačkách a prolézačkách, jejichž nefunkční trosky stále trčí na trávnících. V mateřských školách jsou dnes výčepy, herny a zastavárny a všechno se to šklebí ostrými barvami a hroznými obličejí Jolly Jockerů slibujících plné jackpoty.]’ (ZT: 23-24)

Such is contemporary Ostrava reflected in the eyes of an old woman and described by Hans Nedoma. Such is also Ostrava seen by the majority of Balabán's characters (e. g. Martin Vrána's vision of Ostrava was mentioned in the previous chapter). This is what remained from its promising past – ruins of places and ruins of people – only ghostly spirits of their former activity and glamour.

Disappointment with their lives in Ostrava, their uncertainty about the place and their personal crises leads Balabán's characters back to the places where they spent their childhood, or at least a part of it – to the countryside. This is mostly Vysočina, the Czech-Moravian Highlands; a region that consists of small towns and villages, large forests and hills. This is regarded by many of Balabán's characters as their real home, a place nearest to nature, to the heart and so to God. Ostrava is seen as if it was only its necessary but almost unavoidable substitute, mostly despised, only occasionally loved:

'Hans and his siblings loved this dying landscape. A long time after its total destruction, they still searched for the remains of the disappeared world and their memories of all those buried places only confirmed their feeling of exile which they felt in this city. They did not treat this place as their home. And their parents, driven to work here by communist bullying, kept promising each other for thirty years that, in a year or two at the latest, they would move back to Vysočina, the region they left young in order to study and work in this hostile world. Distant Vysočina and the lost villages, these were the unattainable horizons of people who were stuck like flies onto the flycatcher named Ostrava.'

[‘Hans a jeho sourozenci tuhle zanikající krajinu milovali. Ještě dlouho po totálním zplanýrování slídili po zbytcích ztraceného světa a vzpomínky na všechna ta pohřbená místa jen utvrzovaly jejich pocit exilu, který ve městě zakoušeli. Nepovažovali to město za své, a jejich rodiče, zahnaní sem komunistickou šikanou za prací, si třicet let slibovali, že se za rok, nejpozději za dva odstěhují zpátky na Vysočinu, do kraje, z něhož jako mladí odešli studovat a pracovat do nepřátelského světa. Vzdálená Vysočina a ztracené vesnice, to byly nedosažitelné horizonty lidí nalepených jako mouchy na mucholapce jménem Ostrava.‘] (JT: 36)

For those characters who were born there, Vysočina region is the place where romantic ideas meet the reality of contemporary times (Kateřina, Hans and Emil Nedoma in the last three Balabán's works, Bogomil and Johana: CB). Balabán's characters travel there to look for answers to their personal confusion. They look there for their peace of mind which, they believe, is probably hidden only in that place where the memories of their childhood survive.

Sometimes, the Moravian-Silesian Beskydy Mountains play a similarly purifying role as Vysočina. If they do not do so, at least they give Balabán's heroes an opportunity to escape and relax in their hills and woods. In addition, the territory along the River Odra, a river that flows through the Moravian-Silesian region, and the surroundings of the Ostravice River, offer Balabán's characters a momentary distraction from the urban reality of their lives. In general, any countryside is perceived to be a good place for contemplation, a place for healing when one has painful thoughts; the countryside is also seen as a good place to die (Petr Záborský in ‘Dona nobis pacem’: JT, Emil’s attempted death in ‘Tchoř’: JT). Any countryside is perceived to be at peace with the self, with nature and with God. A city is confusion and is an everyday struggle for survival.

In general terms, what we can see in Balabán’s work is a constant play between urban and rural environments. Daniela Hodrová, who dedicated a whole study to her exploration of the human perception of the city and the countryside, says on the address of both environments that ‘in the countryside, in the “wilderness”, the sense of communion of a being and the surrounding world, the sense of one’s blending with the world of nature is quite a common experience...’ [‘v přírodě, v „divočině“ je pocit splývání bytosti s jejím okolím, vplývání do proudu přírodních dějů zážitkem poměrně běžným...’] (Hodrová 2006: 63). In the city, on the other hand, she argues, one hardly experiences the same feelings, ‘because one finds it hard to accept the city, an ambiguous world which is mostly based on camouflage, pretence, expulsion, false idols, lack of communication and lack of understanding’ [‘že není snadné přijmout město, tento ambivalentní svět založený namnoze na zastírání, předstírání, vytěšňování, na nepravých modlách, nedostatku komunikace a porozumění’] (Ibid). But, despite all these negative aspects of the city, Hodrová also considers the city to be a place which is in a constant flow. According to her, an inhabitant of the city is either trying to find a way through the stream of the city and drifts along or allows himself/herself to be carried away. By doing so, he/she also contributes to the flow of the city – by his/her life, his/her thoughts, his/her dreams and transformations. He/she ‘feels, tries, thinks, dreams and transforms this flowing city into his/her own consciousness, but also to his/her unconscious, a communion of one and the other – a stream of these spheres and a stream of the city are the one’ [‘vnímá, zakouší, myslí, sní, proměňuje plynoucí město ve svém vědomí, ale také v nevědomí, vplývajících jedno do druhého – proud těchto sfér a proud města jsou vlastně proudem jediným’] (Ibid). Balabán’s characters seem to be flowing in the same stream. For them, the countryside is a place where things are happening in communion with nature and in harmony with a cycle of life. There they feel to be in the centre of things and at peace with themselves. They feel understood there and this is the reason why they keep returning. On the other hand, the city – Ostrava – is seen as a place of both – the human structures and their destruction, structured industry and human wilderness. The city attracts them by its never ending flow, yet they suffer there. The countryside is their place of heart: they dwell there. The city is their place of participation: they act there.

The journey to the countryside and to the core of their selves is a cleansing experience for some of the Balabán's key characters but, for many of them, it is also the experience of a personal pain. They travel to the countryside to find their peace of mind but they also leave the countryside in order to escape from its innocent nature; to the urban places where everything is flowing and everything is anonymous and unknown. In that case, the city is a perfect place to hide from the responsibility they hold for themselves. That is why Balabán's characters keep visiting the countryside but they never move back there.

4. Jan Balabán - Summary

4.1 Balabán's 'fictive' world

Having analyzed the interaction of various themes and motifs in the structure of Balabán's works, it is worthwhile to consider again what kind of reality Balabán's works describe and how this reality relates to the reality the author and the reader knows from his/her own experience of the outside world.

Balabán's work is a study of people from different generations who meet at the end of the 20th century and at the beginning of the 21st century in Ostrava or are somehow connected to the city. Balabán's fiction shows Czech society constantly seeking happiness and constantly falling through. His protagonists are ordinary individuals who experience their individual love and misery, family life and loneliness. They are people who have spiritual awareness but keep losing it. They experience emotional breakdowns and personal comebacks. Each of them fights his/her own battles and each of them has a different way of coping with these.

Balabán's fictive world is full of individuals who spend years and years in confusion and in a desperate questioning of their identity and their place within the external world. We meet them when they are emotionally weak and tired from the life they have experienced so far, when they are exhausted from the current world and uncertain of their future. Through repeated recollections of their past, these people seek an explanation of their momentary condition. They search for the reasons that brought along the end of their relationships, their divorces, their loneliness and their inclination to drink or to want to commit suicide. Over and over again, they delve into their thoughts about their past. They explore their relationship with their parents, their partners and children, with Ostrava, with society and God. What they discover about themselves is often very disappointing and sad but it also helps them to reflect upon their own existence and upon the possibility to change it for the better.

In Balabán's works, we follow the personal lives of various women and men. We meet most of them during the period of their mid-years crisis and in doubt about what to do next. Balabán's men lack confidence in their lives, in their relationships with other people, in family and in love and they often break down when things fall apart. These men escape whenever the situation turns out less favourable and more complicated than they expected. It is their own personal weakness they show to the world that makes them behave as cowards when facing accusations and unpleasant surprises. The only way that these men can protect their own sanity is to hide in their inner thoughts, in memories or in the worlds which they have created through their imagination, and so they do. In order to get there, though, they often reach for a drink as it is alcohol that helps them to forget about the real and to cope.

In their inner thoughts, memories and dreams, Balabán's men search for their lost selves, but only some of them find it. In their inner thoughts, they look for the key to happy life in love, in passion, in partnership and marriage. They also seek a way out of their personal loneliness in which they ended up after the breakdown of their relationship, family or marriage. And again, only some of them find it.

For both men and women, there is never an easy way to reach understanding in matters of love. The majority of Balabán's characters experience separation or divorce and many years of undesired loneliness before they find another love or another reason to live. Men, exhausted by the collapse of their first relationships or marriages, retrieve their personal confidence when they strike up relationships with much younger women. Women, on the contrary, do not seek new relationships. They devote themselves to their children and that keeps them strong and going on.

Balabán's society consists of people who are desperate in their never-ending struggle for peace of mind and for their personal happiness. This struggle is almost unbearable when it concerns only one individual but, when it involves at least two individuals, somehow it can be endured. The presence of family and love gives many of Balabán's characters the strength they need to overcome the obstacles life has laid in front of them, and of obstacles there are many: personal indifference, intolerance, different attitudes to life, different expectations, age, illness or death, different political and social environment and different reality of the outside world.

Balabán's characters are lost in the diversity of the external world and in their own perception of their selves within this world. Their unity with people and society, with God and spirituality, and with the Earth broke down the moment they stopped being children. It was the moment when they realized, for the first time, how cruel and indifferent this world can be to each individual. The world which Balabán describes is full of many individuals who struggle to regain this unity they lost during their lives and they know that the only way to get it back again is through love. This is a rather mythological, religious way of thinking. This is also how Balabán's characters perceive the human life – in love with people and in love with God. Without love there is only darkness. With love there comes light and hope.

4.2 The image of the 'real' world

At the beginning of the chapter on Balabán's fiction, it has been already suggested that Balabán's works are inspired by the reality perceived and known by the writer himself. Like many Czech citizens, Balabán's characters also live in a world affected by both World Wars and by the forty years of communist rule, followed by the regime change in 1989. The majority of these people have experienced the Soviet invasion. Some of them experienced it directly and some were affected only by the consequences of the invasion. Balabán's characters became the witnesses and the victims of the country's industrialization within its centralized economy and socialism after they moved for work to the industrial city of Ostrava. In order to do so, many of them had to leave behind their village homes and everything in which they believed. Their faith in God and in themselves, in the stability of family life and in the good nature of society in general was shaken. After the arrival of the de-regulated and highly individualistic capitalist regime, Balabán's characters find themselves lost in the highly chaotic world of new ideas and new forms. And this is the moment when they start thinking about their past. They travel back to the places of their birth and re-visit times before all their problems started, their childhood and the countryside, and so, in their eyes, their 'prehistory', a Christian unity of the world. Only in reunion with their past, as they believe, can they reach the understanding of the present world and their own selves within.

In contemplating their individual predicament, its beginnings, breaking points and its finality, Balabán's characters try to capture the sense of their existence within the estranged world of the present times; within the world which is constantly seeking happiness but experiencing a great deal of complications and troubles.

The world Balabán created is the image of the world he himself experienced when living under the communist 'normalization' and under the capitalist 'democracy' as one of the Czech (Czechoslovak) citizens. It is the world of personal confusion, personal challenges, losses and gains through which the whole Czech (Czechoslovak) society went during the 20th century. Balabán's characters emerged from such a personal experience of those dramatic years. Hence, their life is always considered on the wider scale. It is considered within the scope of 'maybe we are leaving' ('možná že odcházíme') and 'we are here' ('jsme tady') and so within the grief over the lost past and their hope for the future. Balabán himself describes this world with the following words:

‘Life is constantly and tirelessly surviving in the inhospitable environment. And now someone will tell you that it is all futile, that such growth does not make any sense! I would say that because it is so persistent, it has to make sense. I am interested in this persistence of human spirit – it moves me that we keep trying to re-inhabit this inhospitable radioactive plate over and over again and still consider it to be beautiful. I am trying to find some traces upon which I can hang my belief that all this is not futile, whether it occurs in the life of an individual or in the whole Universe.’

[‘Život se pořád neúnavně chytá v nehostinném prostředí. A teď vám někdo řekne, že je to celé zbytečné, že takovýto růst nemá smysl! Já bych řekl, že když je to tak urputné, tak to právě smysl mít musí, už skoro nic jiného než smysl. Tahle urputnost mě v lidských osudech zajímá a dojíká, že tu nehostinnou radioaktivní desku pořád znovu zabydlujeme a považujeme za krásnou. Snažím se najít nějaké stopy, o které by se dala opřít víra, že to všechno není marné, v individuálním životě i ve vesmíru.’ (Balabán: Balaštík: Reichel 2004. Host, vol. 8: 5-9)

The world he sees is the world of constant creation, destruction and recovery – the world of depression and hope. It is the world affected by various powers subjected to political, economical and social changes of the outside world. But foremost, it is the world ruled by the powers of the universe.

Conclusion

Hakl's and Balabán's fiction - comparisons being made

1. Within the context of Czech fiction

At the beginning of this thesis, we have touched upon Haman's theory of two lines in the Czech post-1989 prose. To remind ourselves, Haman suggests that, since 1989, the vast majority of Czech prose writers have been using either authenticity and awareness or fantasy and imagination to create their unique narratives. Furthermore, Haman also proposes that both the authentic and the imaginative line of literature has been leading away from the literature of storytelling more towards the documentary and biographical style of writing or towards the destruction of the narrative. In his view, this is the way the contemporary Czech literature has reacted on the reality from which it arose: the reality of large political, economic, social and culture changes that have affected Czech society after the fall of communism, the reality of the ending millennium, the reality of new developments in technological studies and new possibilities in human creation – the multidimensional reality of versatile and subjective truths.

Considering Haman's theory as one of the possible interpretations of the development in the contemporary Czech literature, what then would be the position of Hakl's and Balabán's prose within these lines?

The analysis of Hakl's prose shows us a few interesting things. Firstly, it shows that Hakl applies his perception of the real world to create the world which is fictive. He uses his own personal experience to create the fictive character of Jan Beneš. He uses his own knowledge of Prague to create the genius loci of his works. He uses his understanding of the contemporary reality to create the fictive present of his works. Hakl presents the world which he wants to be authentic but plays with various levels of human imagination. This world mixes individuals' observations, pub talks, thoughts, dreams and other virtual worlds. It mixes the external reality with the internal self. It mixes the everyday ordinary world with ordinary and extraordinary stories of various people and with extraordinary thoughts the narrator has about the contemporary world and about his position in it. It arises from the narrator's present but keeps returning to his past, as well as to his apocalyptic visions of the future. It comments on the reality of everyday things and on the reality of the self. It is highly critical of both but it also gives both a sarcastic look and humour.

The fictive reality of Balabán's work is also built from the author's observations of the real world. It contains various episodes from the lives of rather ordinary people living in Ostrava or being in some way connected to this city or to the inhabitants of this city. It shows people in constant conflict with their own selves and with the outside world. It shows people constantly doubting their present and past experiences and, within these, also the overall human existence. Balabán presents a world which is not interested in the outside world as much it is interested in the internal self of each human individual. It is existential and emotionally unsettled and sad.

Hakl's fiction is the testimony of a single character of Jan Beneš (with some minor exceptions) and his perception of the self and the outside world. It is highly subjective but it is open to a great diversity of the external world and to all the different impulses that come out of it. Balabán's work, in contrast with this, is a testimony of various individuals and their lives. It is also subjective but it is also very much internal. Balabán's characters take a path that leads to their own selves, to their hearts and to their existence within their own spirit and the universe. Hakl's characters step out towards the reality of the contemporary world.

Both Hakl's and Balabán's fiction is built on the authentic experience of the real world. Yet, in the case of Hakl's work, it also plays with the imagination of the human mind, boosted by the individual's intake of virtual worlds created by literature, film, PC games and by science. Balabán's work is a spiritual journey of the self.

Considering Haman's theory in conjunction with the results of the above analysis, we may conclude that Hakl's and Balabán's work is closer to the line of authentic literature rather than imaginative. However, it is Hakl's fiction which sometimes mixes both. And it is Balabán's fiction which is more submerged in storytelling rather than in documenting the present reality of the contemporary world.

Hakl's and Balabán's fiction is a testimony about life of contemporary Czech society. Yet, it uses a highly individualistic style to approach it – and a different way to understand it.

2. The image of contemporary world

Detailed analysis of Hakl's and Balabán's works reveals certain patterns and certain differences in 'the image of reality' these works construct. The literary testimony of both writers is built up on various stories and episodes from the lives of certain individuals who grew up in the Czech Republic/Czechoslovakia and lived through all the different political, economic, social and cultural changes that Czech society experienced in the course of the 20th and the beginning of the 21st century.

In the works of both writers, we see the world through the eyes of people who struggle to cope with the reality in which they live. They are rather ordinary people who search for their place within society and for peace within their internal selves but only some of them find it. They are the people who have strong feelings about society and the world but do not know what to do with it and so often end up disrupting their own lives and the lives of others. They are the people who suffer from depression when they are alone but who find it difficult to be happy in the unity with others. They are the people who seek their recognition within the external world but often end up struggling with a lack of self-confidence and a lack of faith.

In Hakl's and Balabán's works, we see men who lose their self-confidence because they have experienced broken relationships, seen missed opportunities and lost jobs. We see men who have become loners, alcoholics, losers and wasters of their own time. They do not know how to behave as proactive individuals, responsible husbands and partners at work. These are men who are unable to carry the burden of responsibility for the lives of others and end up escaping from the real world to a world of fiction, of dreams, of games and alcoholic or marihuana visions.

In majority of Balabán's and Hakl's works, we follow the predicament of men who find themselves on the verge of their mid-life crises and in the situations when they are trying to re-examine their lives, all their past losses and mishaps, their confusions and their hopes for the future. These men are vain individuals who have their own views about the world but end up entangled in words and thoughts rather than taking action. Their thoughts and their talks are self-defensive and self-centred. Their actions are confused. They often get lost in the chaos of their everyday reality.

Hakl's and Balabán's male characters are alike. However, there is a certain difference between them and this difference lies in their level of adaptation to the external world and in their perception of time. Balabán's men inhabit the real world but the world in which they actually dwell is their own internal universe. They live for other people and for love but struggle to keep it. They live for the unity of human beings, nature and God but they constantly question it. They live for hope but again only some of them actually recognize this hope and follow its prospects in their present. The world of Hakl's men is also real and, as such, it is also considered. It is the world built up on a mixture of impulses from individuals' observations of the surrounding reality to individuals' thoughts. Hakl's men are totally shattered by the constant flow of the reality of the outside world. They are locked in their old habits and struggle to adapt them to a constantly changing present. Thus they live in permanent uncertainty. Either they live alone, or they quickly start up relationships and, just as quickly, break them. They cannot hold down a job. They live partially among friends, partially with their girlfriends but they cannot stand this and so they opt out of society and live like outcasts for the time being. Balabán's male characters consider life with great emotions. They are filled with nostalgia and with sorrow about the world and the human existence within it. Hakl's male characters look at the world with a highly critical eye, but some of them also know how to be ironic, sarcastic and how to laugh at themselves and others.

The image of women differs with the age of each female individual in Hakl's and Balabán's fiction. Generally speaking, Hakl's and Balabán's middle aged women are more proactive than their men. Just like men in their mid-years, they experience much destructive confusion, many failures, breakdowns and losses but the attitude they employ to overcome all their difficulties is different. Their minds are more firmly anchored in the present. They also remember their past but they do not repeatedly mull over it. They carry their past forward and act on overcoming it. Young female characters are full of energy. They are eager to discover what the world is about. They travel abroad. They explore the hidden nooks and crannies in the souls of older men. Older women live to care for their children and their men.

Hakl's and Balabán's women are passionate and loving. If men do not reciprocate their love, they move on or turn in to their internal selves. They concentrate on life with their children or on their careers. Hakl's and Balabán's female characters are much more mature and realistic individuals than men. Most of them know what they want, what they need and what their families require, and then they set about securing it.

The image of women also differs with the view of each narrator in Hakl's and Balabán's fiction. Whilst in Balabán's works, women have their own voice and so the means of expressing their own thoughts on various matters, in Hakl's works we observe women only through the eyes of a male, the main narrating character of all the stories. As a result, their image is quite shallow as it is fully biased by their male counterpart and his own perspective on feminine matters of life. In Hakl's work, female characters are just a perception of the male narrating 'I' – they are his image. In Balabán's work, women actually participate in the creation of the world in which they live.

To sum up, Hakl's and Balabán's fiction constructs a reality of broken perspectives, broken individuals and individuals' worlds. It is a world where communication between men and women, between family members and between friends has been temporarily lost. It is a world which people find to be hostile to their individual views, needs and desires. It is a world which they struggle to accept and to understand. It is a world where people fear losing their private existence and their intimate contact with others. It is a world in which people are afraid of losing control over their affairs. It is a world in which people struggle to find a balance between their own individuality and outside reality. They yearn for a settled, relaxed and contented existence, yet they do not know how to achieve it.

It is the nature of the human beings that makes Hakl's and Balabán's characters constantly struggle for their desires and their needs. It is the life in the city that makes Hakl's and Balabán's characters question their individuality within the mass. It is life in the new market-orientated society that gives Hakl's and Balabán's characters the feeling of insecurity within a world which places profit above social values and which offers more chaos rather than structured forms and faith. It is the mores of Czech post-communist society that have made Hakl's and Balabán's characters re-examine their pre-1989 lives in an attempt to find a way to live peacefully in the new democratic world. It is life under post-communist capitalism in the digital age, dominated by advertising and the celebrity culture, that makes Hakl's and Balabán's characters worry that it is no longer possible to reach out to human beings and to live one's own, authentic existence rather than to fall in the mass which has no real faith and no belief. Yet, they still attempt to do so.

Hakl's and Balabán's fiction is a testimony about the life of contemporary Czech society as much as any other work that has been created in a certain time and a certain environment would be. Yet, it is also unique – in a way it speaks. It is entertaining and insightful. And it is diverse.
